Cosmopolitan Enterprise.

We extract the following article from the London Cosmopolitan:
Since the termination of the war in America, the attention of far-seeing capitalists on both sides of the Atlantic has been directed to the improvement of the impoverished States of the South, and especially to the development, in a far greater degree than has ever yet been accomplished, of their immense material resources. It cannot be doubted that the future prosperity of the South, however it may be retarded by the action of unwise and unprincipled politicians, will be great beyond the most sanguine dreams of Southern statesmen themselves. In this wise region, on which Heaven smiles, there is no State which may look forward with larger confidence to a glorious destiny than Virginia, or as it has always been proudly known, the "Old Dominion." This Commonwealth has been severed for political purposes, and is now two States—Virginia and West Virginia; but from the Chesapeake to the Ohio, its interests, feelings, sentiments, are one—and political partition cannot affect the essential community of views that characterizes its people. Virginia, notwithstanding the stirring events of the last four years, which directed towards it as the theatre of war the gaze of all the world, is but little known to Europeans. To say that it has 64,000 square miles; that it enjoys a mild and healthful climate; that it is traversed by noble rivers navigable for more than 150 miles from the seaboard; that one of the finest harbors of the American continent is to be found where it borders on the Atlantic; that the soil responds with generous harvests to the labors of the husbandman; that it abounds in thermal and medicinal springs, in mineral wealth, in water power for manufactures—all this makes little impression on the foreigner, and all this falls short of conveying any adequate idea of Virginia's capacities. Her strongest assurance of future pre-eminence among the States of America is to be sought in the fact of her central position, whereby the most direct road from the ocean to the boundless valley of the Mississippi lies through her borders. The boundary line of West Virginia is the Ohio River, the natural highway of Western trade seeking the ocean transit; and all that is required to pour into her lap the wealth of the continent, exceeding that of Ormuz and of Ind, is that some great line of internal improvement shall be constructed to connect the Ohio with the waters of the Chesapeake.

So distinctly was this foreseen by the gentlemen of Virginia, of generations gone by, that George Washington, three-quarters of a century ago, conceived the idea of uniting the Ohio River and the Chesapeake by a canal; and there can be no question that had the canal been made, Virginia would have realized that vast material advantage which was secured to New York by the genius and energy of DeWitt Clinton, and which has placed New York foremost in wealth and physical importance among the States of the American Union. But no determined effort was made to construct a canal until many years after the great Erie water line had been steadily pouring the products of the West into the Hudson River at Albany; and this effort was attended with so many difficulties that, at the breaking out of the war between North and South, the James River and Kanawha Canal was still far from completion.

Within a few months past a French company, which had been conducting negotiations before the war for the purchase of the unfinished canal, under obligations to carry it through to the Ohio river, has formally closed the bargain, and the transfer of the whole line has been made to them with the sanction of the Legislature of both Virginia and West Virginia.

The consent of the Legislature of West Virginia was obtained through the intelligence and untiring President of the former James River and Kanawha Canal Company, Col. Thomas H. Ellis, of Richmond; and the agents of the French company, which is known as MM. Ernest Bellet des Minieres, Preres et Cie., are actively engaged in raising the capital that will be required for the performance of their engagements. The moment, it must be admitted, is not favorable to important financial operations. With the Continent of Europe trembling in the doubtful balance of peace, and the paralysis of a terrible monetary crisis putting a stop, for a time, to all business on the London Stock Exchange, it is difficult to see how the new owners of the great Virginia canal will be able to conduct their affairs successfully. But that the money of the world has not been annihilated by the depreciation of stocks and the absolute destruction of certain values, is quite plain, and it will surely find its investment, when the storm is over, in those works and enterprises which look beyond the petty schemes of a day to a future of ever increasing magnitude and importance. Such a work is the Virginia canal.

Should the day come, within forty or fifty years, which Col. Jevons predicts, when the coal-beds of England shall be exhausted, and the roar of her countless iron foundries shall, by consequence, be silenced, Virginia will then control the manufacturing interests of the world, for in Virginia alone, and along the line of this canal, are to be found mines of coal and veins of iron ore in close neighborhood, surpassing the stores of England before these had ever been disturbed. In view of such a fact, the capitalists, appalled by the crash of falling corporations in the commercial earthquake which is now shaking the exchanges of the Old World, may well seek to place his money where it must secure for him, at no distant day, a large and safe return. The practical energy and unflinching foresight of Frenchmen have found the opportunity for their capital in the plan of MM. Bellet des Minieres, but there are also far-seeing Englishmen who recognize both the grandeur of the undertaking and the desirability of admitting into its conduct an English element. Could the great West of America be united to Europe through a water line of communication to the Atlantic, constructed by French and English capitalists, the "Virginia Canal Company," in the variety of interests it represented, and the magnitude of the ends it sought to accomplish, might, indeed, be considered a cosmopolitan work.

An old man committed suicide at Patterson, New Jersey, on his first wife's grave, because he didn't like his second. A letter was found in his pocket, containing a feeling allusion to his recent troubles, and concluding with a touching request to be buried in the same grave with his dead wife.
