2M.E. a. Dangers to be avolted.

In the upheaval of political and social elements consequent to a long war and incident to the re-organization of national elements, there are certain dangers to be avoided. Especially is it so in a vast country like ours, inhabited by peoples almost as distinct in their personal and national characteristics are in their personal and national characteristics as if they had sprung from different races. In the game of "stoop to conquer" which the weaker party is sometimes compelled to play, the greatest circumspection should be used, lest it should undergo some moral metamorphosis in the course of the contest that shall seriously impair its native force and character.

Our friends in Virginia, Tennessee, Mississippi and Texas—we call them so because no man will dare question their integrity and devotion to the South have found it necessary, in order to re-cover their rights as freemen, to form for the time being a political union with men with whom they do not agree upon the questions that have of late agitated the country. In other words, they have agreed to suspend for the time their honest convictions of public policy, that they may regain their liberty and put themselves in a position to be seen and felt in the great movements of government. They do not sacrifice those convictions, but simply agree to make them no longer a bone of contention since they have become powerless to give them a practical effect in the Govern-ment. They are just and true in theory GETTYSBUEG, August 25.—The identification scheme is a failure. Most of the letters from prominent Generals deplore the movement, as tending to tear They are just and true in theory and vindicated by all experience, and as such the day for their resurrection may be looked for with confidence. There is nothing clearer than the proposition that this Government cannot be successfully administered upon the principles laid down by the radical party. They contain within themselves inherently the elements of disintegration and flual expulsion. It is not our purpose now to elaborate them.

But while true Southern men thus unite for a great public purpose with those who agree with them on certain vital points, and differ on many others, they should be careful that the character of the union be clearly understood by hemselves as well as by others. Assimilation is a principle of human nature. When once in association with men, we are apt to adopt their vices as well as their virtues. What may now appear opposed to all correct views of reason and right, may, through familiarity, appear in time less odious, if not positive ly tolerable. This result is to be guarded against as we value our character and our peace. We want no Northern isms and heresies engrafted upon Southern stocks. Above all things, we should shun what they boastingly denominate "New England civilization," as the greatmore doing, at 1.10@1.12. Pork dull, at 32.75. Lard steady. Whiskey lower, at 1.24@1.25.
