Comradeship in Marriage

There are a good many books and articles about love and marriage, but most of them miss the point that one of the important factors in a thoroughly successful marriage is that husband and wife should possess the capacity of being good comrades to each other. After the first transports of affection are over, the importance of that consideration will manifest itself. It is not quite easy to say in what good comradeship consists. It implies a certain identity of tastes, a certain geniality of disposition, and a certain unselfishness in the habitual point of view. One of the best results of the higher ed ucation of women is not that it does something to fit them on an emergency to earn their own livings, but that it develops their capacity of bringing the element of comradeship into their marriage with men of education; but graduation from a college does not always impart this. The faculty of appreciation and sympathy by a swift intuition is one of the great endowments of women, and it frequently compensates for a lack of technical education. And women have an equal right to look for this quality in their husbands. A man would do well to neglect some rather important matters rather than to let his wife miss this quality in him. We have been led to these observations by the recent death of the wife of Lord Salisbury. The two began life together in poverty. He had to earn his living by writing for the newspapers and reviews. Lady Salisbury had the fine gift of comradeship. Those who knew them well said that the successes of one were the triumphs of both, and when be succeeded to Hatfield and the premiership of England, he had no more trusty counsellor or loval coadjutor than his own wife.-The Watchman.
