UNCLE SAM'S ISLAND CHILDREN

His Little Wards of Guam Never Had Anybody to Look After Them Until Capt. Leary Took Charge of Their Land—The Schools That Were Established Centuries Ago by an Old Spanish Queen and Then Forgotten

Among the far-off places which Uncle Sam has taken under his care is the island of Guam. You will find it on a map of the Pacific Ocean, lying in that group of islands to the northward of Australia and to the eastward of the Philippines which are known as the Ladrone or the Mariana Islands. It is a small island, only thirty-two miles long and about eight miles across at its widest part.

In this far-away island, fringed with coral reefs and covered with a dense tropical vegetation, are two thousand children, most of them born the subjects of the boy king of Spain, but all growing up now under the Stars and Stripes.

Before Uncle Sam took possession of the island the children of Guam just lolled about and did pretty much as they pleased. You will see by looking at the map that the island lies well within the tropic zone, and consequently the weather there is always like a warm summer afternoon—one of those afternoons in vacation time when you don't even feel like playing baseball, but like to swing in a hammock under the trees, or take off your shoes and stockings and go paddling in the brook or along the beach.

These children never have experienced a cold day which sent the blood tingling in their cheeks and made them step along lively to keep warm. You could not explain to them what snow is, or give them an idea of the pleasures of a snowball fight. If you were to tell them of a country where, in certain months of the year, the water turned solid in the lakes and ponds, they would not be able to believe you, for ice they could not comprehend.

Many of the children went to school for a while each year, but when they had learned to read and write they considered that their education was finished. Having learned to read and write, the children went out to help their parents gather the cocoanuts and dry the meat which is scooped out of the hard shell. This dried meat of the cocoanut is called copra and the people of Guam sold it to the traders who visited the island, exchanging it for cotton cloth, knives, flour and various other articles which they could get in no other way, and sometimes getting money for it.

The traders took the copra away and pressed the oil out of it, selling it for good prices in the markets of the outer world.

The folks of Guam had little patches where they raised yams—which are something like sweet potatoes—and the breadfruit tree gave them a food of which they were especially fond. Everybody who ever has eaten the fruit of the breadfruit tree likes it and wants more. It is a round fruit, about the size of a small watermelon, and when baked it beats any bread you ever ate.

So the islanders did just enough work to keep themselves from starving and the children lived an aimless, lazy, ignorant life, with no books to read and no pictures to look at, until one day an American man-of-war sailed into the harbor of Agana, the town which is the capital of the island, and took possession of the place in the name of the United States.

Then Capt. Richard Leary was sent out there as governor. He issued an order immediately that every child between eight and fourteen must go to school. He also issued a proclamation urging the parents to learn English at once, so that they would be able to help their children with their studies.

He found that some of the grown-up folk on the island could not even write their own names and so issued an order that every man and woman in Guam must learn to write his or her own name before July 1, 1901, or go to jail. Those who could not write their own names, told one of the captain's clerks what it was, and the clerk wrote it down on a piece of paper, which the people took home, where they copied the names until they got so that they could

FARMING INTERESTS

We note by the October number of the Stockman, published at DeFuniak by R. W. Storrs, that R. O. Connor, of Marion county, is asking how to get Bermuda grass started. He wants to set out from one to five acres.

Mr. Z. C. Chambliss, of Ocala, desires to ascertain the different uses to which velvet beans have been put and their different values.

STARTLING, BUT TRUE

"If every one knew what a grand medicine Dr. King's New Life Pills is," writes D. H. Turner, Dempseytown, Pa., "you'd sell all you have in a day. Two weeks' use has made a new man of me." Infallible for constipation, stomach and liver troubles. 25c. at Anti-Monopoly Drug-store.

Fresh shipment of sweet and sour pickles in bulk. S. R. Pyles.
