

Stills. The nature of the soil and the character of the streams have brought stills very much into use in some countries. On the "Landes" of Gascony, in France, they are about as common as shandy. Over those broad, marshy and sandy plains the shepherd goes stalking on high stilts, which will not only enable him to pass the deep pools and wet places in his way, but also to overlook his flock feeding among the low, thorny shrubs and brushwood with which the region is partly covered. He mounts his stilts, from the roof of his house or his stable roof, early in the morning and does not quit them until night. They are made fast, not at the knee, but at the thigh, in such a way as to allow the legs to move freely. He carries a long pole, which serves several purposes. It is his shepherd's crook; and with it he steadies his steps when necessary, supports himself when he wishes to rest, eases his descent to the ground when he wishes to lie down or sit, and gets up again at pleasure. Thus lifted above the earth, he goes striding like an immensely tall, thin-legged giant, over hedges and ditches and bushes, with perfect ease and security, and sometimes running with remarkable speed, like some grotesque, half-human crane. Races on stilts are a favorite pastime in Gascony, and other countries of the South France. The people of Namur, in Belgium, became early famous for their use of stilts, in consequence of the overflow of the rivers Sambre and Meuse, which periodically flooded the city streets. In the seasons of high water, men and women stepped out of their windows, going about their business and making calls, on stilts. These, introduced at first as a matter of necessity, at length became a source of amusement, and made Namur famous for one of the most remarkable games on record. This was the battle on stilts. The city was divided into two sections, called the old and the new town, the inhabitants of which—like those of many another town in our day—were constantly at strife with each other. Their feuds were of good natural sort, however, though they sometimes resulted in some pretty rough sport. The Namurois were fond of games; and a hundred and fifty years ago the stilt fight, introduced nobody knows when, was at the height of its popularity. The combatants, five or six hundred in number, divided into two bands, regularly officered, and distinguished by the color of their costumes, advanced upon each other in the public square, mounted on stilts four feet high. They were unarmed; but wrestling, and kicking, and thrusting with the stilt-legs—some of the most dangerous weapons—were allowable. The battle began with the sound of martial music and the armies were led with gay banners. Women followed their lovers, brother and husbands to the fight, their mission being to encourage and cheer them on by their presence, to support the falling, and to assist the wounded from the field. These battles lasted an hour or two or longer, the combatants often fighting with great spirit and determination. Marshal Saxe, who, in 1748, witnessed one of these encounters, said of it: "If two armies engaged showed as much valor as the youths of Namur, it would not be merely a battle, but a butchery." Once, when the Archduke Albert of Austria passed through Belgium, the Governor of Namur promised that he should see a battle in which the warriors would fight neither on foot nor on horseback, and got up a stilt combat for his entertainment. The Archduke was so much delighted that he at once exempted the Namurois from the payment of the tax on beer—a privilege which they enjoy, we think, to this day. An Adroit Swordsman. Pulaski, as it is well known, was an adroit a swordsman as he was perfect in horsemanship, and he ever rode powerful and fleet chargers. During the retreat of the American army through New Jersey, in the darkest hour of our national adversity, he was pursued by a small party of British cavalry, the head of which was a good horseman and mounted nearly as well as Pulaski. Pulaski rode in the rear of his detachment and the British captain in front of those he commanded. The morning sun was shining beautifully, brightly, casting oblique shadows, and as the pursued party entered a long, narrow lane, Pulaski having satisfied himself of the superior speed and command of his horse over that of his pursuer, slackened his pace and kept his horse to the side of the lane farthest from the sun. The pursuing officer came up in hot haste, his sword elevated so as to make the decisive cut upon Pulaski as soon as he could reach him. Pulaski rode as though he heard not the advance upon him, yet he kept his eye fixed wearily upon the ground on the side of his horse towards the sun on the right. As soon as he saw the shadow of his pursuer's horse gain upon him and that the horse's head, by his shadow, had gained about half the length of his own horse's body, he gave the sudden sword-cut of St. George with his powerful arm, and saw the decapitated head of the English officer following the stroke. His mathematical eye had measured the distance by the position of the shadow so accurately, his position of giving a long reach to his right arm, when the cross stroke of his pursuer must have been made at such shorter distance to have effect, that the pursuing officer lost his head before he suspected the proximity which was known or that a blow was mediated. The science of sword exercise is again amusingly illustrated by the anecdote of the British, French and American gentlemen at the time, were invited to witness the decapitation of three criminals; the Sultan having heard that all these gentlemen were excellent swordsmen, proposed that each should show his skill upon the culprits, which being agreed to, the Englishmen at a single, strong, muscular blow sent the head of the first criminal flying to the farther end of the field; the Frenchmen requested a blue ribbon tied around the neck of the second criminal, which being done, with a swift and graceful stroke, he severed the man's head, dividing into equal parts the blue ribbon. The American's turn now came, and at the word, he made a swift cut at the third criminal, but behold! the head of the criminal did not drop, whereupon the man to receive the blow; he did so and his head dropped to the earth.

"The Old Oaken Bucket"
This beautiful and popular song or ballad is said to have had its origin under the following circumstances, which give it additional interest:
"Some years ago, when Woodworth, the printer, and several other 'Old New Yorkers,' were brother typos in a printing office, which was situated at the corner of Chestnut street and Chambers, there were very few places in the city of N. Y. where one could enjoy the luxury of a really 'good drink.' Among the few places most worthy of patronage, was an establishment kept by Mallory, on Franklin street, on or about the same spot where St. John's Hall recently stood. Woodworth, in company with several particular friends, had 'dropped in' at this place one afternoon, for the purpose of taking some 'brandy and water' that Mallory was famous for keeping.
"The liquor was superior, excellent, and Woodworth seemed inspired by it; after taking a draught, he laid his glass upon the table (remember, room was in those days a man rarely met a friend without inviting him to imbibe), and smacking his lips, declared that Mallory's 'eau de vie' was superior to anything he had ever tasted. 'No,' said M., 'you are quite mistaken; there was one thing which, in both of our estimations, far surpassed this, in the way of drink.' 'What was that?' asked Woodworth, dubiously.
"The draught of pure, fresh spring water that we used to drink from the old oaken bucket that hung in the well, after our return from the labors of the field on a sultry day in summer."
"The last drops glistened for a moment in Woodworth's eye. 'True! true!' he replied, and soon after quitted the place. He returned to the office, grasped the pen, and in half an hour 'The Old Oaken Bucket,' one of the most delightful compositions in our language, was ready, in manuscript, to be entered in the memories of succeeding generations."
THE LORD, THE LADY, AND THE MYSTERIOUS TELEGRAM.—The London Court Circular relates the following anecdote respecting a noble lady:
During the Army Bill debate her noble husband, who is as proud and fond of her as she should be, was just about to rise and deliver a violent attack upon something or somebody, when a telegram was put into his hands. He read it, turned pale and quitted the House, called a cab, drove to the Clarence Cross station and went to Dover, and was no more heard of until the next day, when he returned to his own home, and to his first inquiry was told that the Countess was in her own room. He hastened to her, and a terrific row ensued: the exact words of which no one knows but themselves. At last however, he burst out, "Then, what did you mean by your telegraph?"
"Mean? What I said of course. What are you talking about?"
"Read it for yourself," returned the still unappeased husband.
She did read:—"I flee with Mr. — to Dover straight. Pray for me."
For a moment she was startled, but then burst out laughing.
"Most dreadful telegraph people. No wonder you are out of your mind. I've drafted simply 'I ton' with Mrs. — in Dover street. Stay for me."
His Lordship was so savage at the laugh he had raised against himself that he was at first inclined to make a Parliamentary question of it, but listening to more judicious advice, refrained.
SMALL AUDIENCE.—One of the Lord's most delightful discourses, second only to the sermon on the mount, is that delivered at Jacob's well to but one listener—and that one a poor despised Samaritan woman. It encourages the heart of a minister, of course to be able to preach to multitudes—often it fosters vanity and pride. But let him not count it condemnation when, the occasion calls it, to speak the truth to the gospel to solitary listeners, or to two or three gathered in the name of Jesus. "For he that converteth but one sinner from the error of his way, saves a soul from death, and bids a multitude of sins."
A man's possessions are just as large as his own soul. If his title deeds cover more, the surplus acres own him, not he the acres.
