Must Have Been Blind. Here is rather a good story, which has also the merit of being true. A large firm in Aberdeen recently engaged as office boy a raw country youth. It was part of his duties to attend to the telephones in his master's absence. When first called upon to answer the bell, in reply to the usual query, "Are you there?" he roared assent. Again the question came and still again, and each time the boy gave an answering nod. When the question came for the fourth time, however, the boy, losing his temper, roared through the telephone: "Man, a' ye bin? I've been noddin' heid off for t' last hauf 'oor!"—London Mail.

AN INCIDENT IN THE LINES

By Lucy Butt.
 A Child's Remembrance of a Favor.

It had been a blazing hot day, even for Ceylon. It seemed as if the sun would never set. When at last it neared the horizon, a breath of wind sprang up and half a dozen men lounged on to the veranda of a bungalow and stretched themselves full length on the chairs and rugs, cooling drinks, cigars and a black boy within reach. A mass of flowers were flitting their tired heads in the garden, now that the heat of the sun was no longer scorching their little lives out of flowers, the color of which one seldom sees in any quantity in sober England—seriet cactus, poinsettia, masses of purple passion flowers, the latter clinging in wild confusion to the rail of the veranda. Strangely out of keeping with the rest was a little bed of mignonette which grew close to the house, so that its fragrant breath came through the windows in the evening hour.

There was silence until the sun had quite disappeared, and then:
 "Why on earth, Wilson," said one man sleepily, "do you keep that little mignonette?"

"Sentiment, my dear fellow, sentiment," was the reply from the man who formed the center of the group. He was stretched full length on a chair which was hardly long enough to allow of six feet four inches. He was slightly built, and his thin face and slender hands were nearly as brown as the little brown dog curled up on his lap. His blue eyes were half closed, and his large planter's hat was pushed off his forehead to enable him to catch the first breath of evening air.

"Sentiment! Ah, indeed! I did not know that was in your line," with a laugh.

"Did you not, Dalton? Now you are enlightened. I am very sentimental. That is why I grow mignonette. It reminds me of home."

There was silence for a minute. Visions of green fields, brooks and bluebells rose unbidden before their eyes. Then at last:
 "I wish you would not talk about home," said a lad fretfully, "when it is so beastly hot. Tell me how you got the mignonette, Wilson. That will pass the time till it is cooler."

Wilson looked at the boy, and his mind flew back to the hours of loneliness he had endured during his first year in Ceylon, then "All right, French," he said, "but there is nothing much to tell. About a year ago it was a hot day like this, piping hot, and I had been staying with the Logans. About 6 in the evening I was crossing the river, three miles off, a cool breeze sprang up, and I stopped a bit to cool the horse's legs. When I reached the other side, I saw the coolies were carrying their bundles up the hill—it was carrying day, you see—and as I watched I thought how grateful I ought to be to Providence for having made me white."

"Brown, you mean?"

"That is the sun, not Providence. Don't interrupt." Then I saw a jolly little beggar not more than 6 years old trailing along by his mother's side. He was a jolly little beggar, quite naked, except for a string of beads around his waist and a bangle, and in his arms he held this touching sleeping puppy lightly with his hand. As I looked I saw it was a bit of a pull for him, and he plodded on so pluckily that I told his mother to give him a lift up behind me on the horse. You see, it was powerful kind."

"Don't apologize," said Dalton, "we all know you."

Wilson took no notice. "That is nearly the end of the story. We did not stop much. He patted my horse and gurgled to himself as we rode along. When we neared the lines, I asked him his name. 'Carupen,' he said. Then I asked him what he called his dog, and I patted it and said it was a nice little thing."

"How could you so perjure yourself?" "I think it is a nice little thing," serenely. "Carupen said its name was Paappu, and then the little beggar asked, 'Nannan Dhurai sunada, ichi nulla jathi nai?'"

"Which, when interpreted, means," said the boy from home, "The dog is a good breed, isn't it, master?"

"I laughed and put the little chap down, but somehow he looked a bit wistful, so I called after him. 'Dhurai thinks he is a fine breed!'"

"He grinned from ear to ear and went in."

"About four months after I was told one evening that a woman from the lines wanted to see me.

"'Dhurai, my child is ill,' she said.

"Which is your child?' I asked.

"'Dhurai will remember, he had a ride on Dhurai's horse.'

"It is odd," went on Wilson dreamily, "the ride should have impressed them so much, but I was in a hurry, and I had the little fellow was ill. I remembered how he had looked that day in the sunlight, dressed in his beads and his puppy clasped to his naked little black body, so I told the woman I would go with her at once."

"He was very bad when I got there, but I gave him some stuff and he revived a bit. It was a hot night, and I lifted him up in his blanket and held him in my arms to let him get some air. Poor little chap, he held on tight to my finger with his little bit of a hand, nearly as thin as mine, and it had been so plump the day he held the reins. At last he said, 'Paappu Dhurai.' His mother brought it, and he stroked it, and then he said sleepily: 'Dhurai keep Paappu. Dhurai think him good breed, and he gave Carupen ride.' That was all. He did not speak again. I suppose he got a bit confused at the end, poor little chap, so I kept the puppy."

"I don't think he was much confused," said French. "He was pretty clear. I should think, and knew what he wanted."

There was a moment's pause, and then:
 "I don't think he is such a bad little beast, after all," said Dalton. "Let's have a look at him."—Crampton's Magazine.

He Refused a 25 Cent Cigar.

Some one tells a good cigar story on the late Dick Oglesby which runs something like this: It was during the Cleveland-Blaire campaign, and Mr. Oglesby was making his first visit of any length in New York. For the first time DeLoon's attracted his attention.

"What kind of a place is that?" he asked.
 "Come in and see," responded his companion. Uncle Dick went in, and the friend ordered a luncheon, on which the two dined right royally. Luncheon finished, he asked the governor to "join him" in a smoke. The clerk at the cigar counter handed out some fine Havanas. Uncle Dick was in the act of taking one when suddenly he drew back and said:

"What's the price of these?"
 "Twenty-five cents," said the clerk.
 "Holy smoke!" exclaimed Uncle Dick. "Put 'em back; put 'em back, quick!"

"But, governor, this is my treat," argued the friend.
 "Daren't do it; daren't do it! Put 'em back!"

"See here, young man," returned Uncle Dick. "I daren't do it. Why, man alive, if they ever found out in Illinois that I smoked 25 cent cigars, whether I paid for 'em or not, they'd turn me out of the church, and it would ruin me politically forever. No, sir. Five-cent cigars at home and 10-cent cigars in New York are good enough for me."—Chicago Chronicle.

Ice Water Versus Hot Water.

The drinking of ice water is pronounced by scientists to amount to a real crime, and Dr. Brubaker has declared this question one of the utmost interest in typhoid fever. He says that if all water should be boiled and filtered there would never be a case of typhoid.

The temperature of the stomach at the moment the ice water enters it is about 105 degrees; the water is 32 degrees. The chilling of and contracting of blood vessels is therefore great, and to the ice water is ascribed the catarrhal condition of the stomach so often suffered from. Dr. Brubaker says water should not be taken with a meal to any great extent, but that hot water taken before breakfast prepares the stomach for action, stimulating the gastric juices and washing away the remains of the last meal. Another glass of hot water taken between breakfast and luncheon will be found beneficial and better than all drugs for curing indigestion, since in passing into the blood the food products are carried along with it. Exercise, too, is necessary to help on the action of the stomach.

A Millionaire Jockey.

Ancient Rome had its racing and its popular and well paid jockeys. Betting ran high, and the excitement of the people over the races and their favorite color frequently led to bloodshed. Calligula—who he made a consul of his horse—passed most of his time rioting with the charioteers.

The circus was the place for the racing. The largest of them, the Circus Maximus, about 21,000 feet long, could accommodate 480,000 spectators. Seven times it was necessary to race round the spina, a low stone wall running down the center of the circus. The jockeys drove in a light chariot—usually four in each race—and wore close fitting tunics and leather caps of distinguishing colors.

That the profession was a paying one we learn from ancient writers, money prizes and wages being paid. The Jockey Greecians, at the age of 23, had amassed a fortune, and Diocles, king of jockeys, left to his son more than $1,000,000.—San Francisco Argonaut.

Quick Mail Transit.

Mr. Gotham—I hear Mr. De Pave has been arrested. What is the charge against him?
 Mr. Brooklyn—Delaying the United States mail.

"My goodness! In what way?"
 "De Pave is very fat, and when a mail wagon ran over him it lost 20 seconds' time and missed the train."—New York Weekly.

A Low Estimate.

"How's the trout fishing up that stream of yours?" asked the Detroit sportsman of the man from the northern part of the state.
 "Well," came the answer slowly. "I've made a rough calculation and find that every trout caught there in the last five years has cost $10. And I only figure $1 a day for labor."—Detroit Free Press.
