Ohio Statesman.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY The Ohio Statesman Company. THURSDAY MORNING, - - - MAY 26, PENDELTON ON WASHBURNE.

A Scene in the House of Representatives. (Correspondence of the Cincinnati Enquirer.) WASHINGTON, May 13.

The bill from the committee on Ways and Means, providing for indemnity to the Mercantile Mutual Insurance Company, of New York, for $8,000 in Commissary notes lost by shipwreck, was before the House to-day, and after the reading of the dispatches announcing Grant's success, our Congressman from the First district, Mr. Pendleton, proceeded to give his views upon the bill.

He was interrupted by Mr. Washburne, who asked the privilege of making a few remarks. Mr. Pendleton courteously yielded the floor. Washburne, with impudence only equalled by disgusting pomposity, said he did not think this a time to be passing bills to pay away the government money.

The government has enough to do to put down the rebellion; and we will put it down, notwithstanding the gentleman (Mr. Pendleton) and his friends on the other side of the House would applaud when they read the dispatches telling of Grant's success; and Washburne closed by moving to lay the bill on the table, in order to cut off all reply.

Mr. Pendleton appealed to Washburne to know if he really intended to insist on his motion, after he (Mr. Pendleton) had yielded the floor. Washburne replied that he insisted on the motion. Whereupon the motion was put and the House voted it down.

Mr. Pendleton said when he yielded to the gentleman (Washburne) in all courtesy, he expected courtesy in return; that the speech of Washburne was the speech of a dirty demagogue; that if Washburne believed his conduct comported with the dignity of his position, he (Mr. Pendleton) was satisfied. Mr. Pendleton added: "The gentleman could not have a more noble opponent than I myself. I think his speech comports with his ability and character. Everybody here understands he would like to be the cynosure of all eyes and the voice for all ears, whenever he makes his appearance in the House. Such the gentleman will doubtless be, when he deserves it. But now he is beneath decent contempt. I set them on the floor of this House, and I regret that I have been seduced from my rule by such a man."

Washburne wilted. (From the Boston Post of May 20th.) Washburne's death. This announcement will be a surprise to the people and the lovers of American literature. It will send sorrow through Plymouth, N. H. He was stopping there in the course of a journey for his health, with ex-President Tyler, his life-long friend. At two in the morning his friend looked in upon him, and at three he found him dead in his bed. Though he has long been an invalid, none of his friends supposed him to be so near his end. He was born in Salem, Mass., in 1804, hence he was nearly sixty years of age. His life was uneventful, yet it has an outline. There are prominent facts to note here, not so much as mile-stones in the progress of his life, as they are in his existence. His growth was that of a man of the imagination, not that of a man of the world; so the ordinary standards of human life will not measure him. His ancestors were men of the sea—his father died at Havana in 1810. It is said of his mother that she was a woman of "great beauty and extreme sensibility," and her grief for her husband's death caused her to live the rest of her life a martyr in absolute seclusion. Here are the sources of the power and the genius of Hawthorne—this "extreme sensibility" was transmitted to the son; he also, by nature, took to seclusion, and there this sensibility full of eyes, and ears, and activities of imagination, conjured up and created those exquisite characters that have become an honor to, and an enduring part of American literature. At 10, Hawthorne was sent to live on the borders of Lake Sebago, in Maine, finally returning to Concord, N. H., preparatory course for college in Salem, and graduated from Bowdoin College in 1825 in the same class with George B. Cheever and Henry W. Longfellow. His friend, the ex-President, graduated in the class preceding. After graduation he remained many years in Salem, a recluse almost from his own household—his only delight was the fair land his own brain created. In 1829 he published a romance never since acknowledged, nor identified by the public. In 1837 he published "Twice Told Tales," collected from his contributions to current literature. Longfellow soon pronounced it the work of a man of genius. It was slow, however, in its progress, and it was not until 1842, when he published "Mosses from an Old Manse," in the study, in the rear of the house, in the same room where Emerson wrote "Nature," and from the windows of which the celebrated author looked upon the battle of Concord Bridge. Here his residence of three years was that of a recluse—he mingled little with the society of the village. In 1846 Mr. Bancroft appointed him Surveyor of the Port of Salem, and for the next three years he was the chief man in the decayed Old Custom-house of that city. In 1849 he removed from Salem to Lenox, and lived in a small red cottage on the shore of a lake called the Stockbridge Bowl. Here he wrote the "House of the Seven Gables," printed in Boston in 1851; also the "Blithedale Romance." His "Scarlet Letter" appeared in 1850, one of the most powerful of his books. In 1853 he removed to Concord, where he purchased a house and a few acres of land; in the same year he published a life of his old friend the candidate for the Presidency. After the inauguration of the new President he was appointed by him as Consul to Liverpool, which office he held until 1857, when he resigned, and spent some time in traveling in Europe. Since his return here, he has published a series of papers in The Atlantic Monthly, and they have been issued under the title of "Our Home." These are simple, plain facts which outline the principal incidents of his outward life. His life

As if the battle wounds were not ghastly enough we read of a surgeon's amputating at the hip-joint of a poor maimed soldier who had been in the operation only a few hours. That surgeon should be tied down to a board and have his own hip-joint divided just to see how pleasant the torture is. The operation is never successful, except in killing the patient, and probably a devilish love of science caused his position in the above instance, the result, "surviving only a few hours," being of no consequence to the remorseless "sawbones" who hacked at a dying patriot with all the ardor the pursuit of knowledge could inspire.
