

The advices received from Havana by the last European steamer, to the effect that all European governments will soon recognize the so-called Confederacy, are entirely without foundation; they owe their origin, probably, to a portion of the mercantile community interested in peace cotton.

The well posted Washington correspondent of the North American, under date of the 2d inst. writes:

By recent intelligence from Minister Adams, I learn, that the English Government will do nothing to violate the neutrality policy already adopted, but it is intimated that some of her majesty's advisers expect that public affairs in this country will soon take such a turn as to render a recognition of the Southern Confederacy practicable. It is certain the London Times entertains this view, and that if a favorable opportunity offered it would advocate the recognition. Before such an opportunity is offered, however, the progress of the war and the growing determination of the North will indicate the impossibility of the triumph of rebellion, and our trans Atlantic friends will hesitate to take any steps at variance with what should be the sentiment of the world. Besides, the people of England generally are with us, heart and soul—they will never submit without a murmur to the recognition of a government based wholly and solely upon human slavery, and controlled by a despotism such as the world never saw before.

The advices received from Havana by the last European steamer, to the effect that all European governments will soon recognize the so-called Confederacy, are entirely without foundation; they owe their origin, probably, to a portion of the mercantile community interested in peace and cotton.