

BONDS AND STOCKS.

Up and Down in Market Values on the New York Exchange.

NEW YORK, Jan. 24.—Stocks again showed an increase in amount of business done to-day, though the general list no more than held its own, the increase being almost entirely due to renewed buying of Reading, which became the leader of the market again and scored a handsome advance. Atehon became a feature during the morning and on heavy purchasing made a material advance. The Northern Pacific group was the most prominent, and Oregon Transcontinental was especially active and strong, though unsettled away later in the day. The market closed firm while dull, generally at small fractional advances over last night's prices. Colorado coal advanced 2 per cent.

Governments were dull and steady. Petroleum—The market opened weak at 10 1/2, but after first sales became strong and advanced to 10 3/4. A slight reaction followed, in which the market closed steady at 10 1/2.

AUGUSTA'S ROMANCE.

The Story of Her Love for a Young French Noble When she Was a Princess.

A member of the suite of one of the best known among our princes tells a romantic story concerning the dead Empress Augusta, and it is believed that it has never before been given to the public. Augusta was a princess in the petty court of Weimar, where she was hedged about with all the strait-laced etiquette of the small German principalities affected. When she was seventeen she was a romantic girl, and had learned by heart the stories of the previous half century's gallantries at the court of Louis XIV. and so well had she read that she was prepared to fall in love with any man who might first appeal to her sense of beauty; but the rigid surveillance of her ducal father and mother made acquaintances almost impossible.

Before this romantic spirit had lived long enough to die, a young French noble scion of a more or less long lineage stopped at the court of Weimar in the progress of a pleasure jaunt from Auvergne. He remained for some weeks at this place and became a favorite of the duke. He was handsome, accomplished, and a dandy. At a court ball shortly following his arrival, the Frenchman met the princess. They were permitted to become partners, and indulged in mutual love at first sight.

This love soon developed into indiscretion, which took the form of secret meetings in the palace grounds. The only person aware of these meetings was the maid and valet of the principals, who served as the medium through which the correspondence was carried on and the meetings arranged. The maid, whether through carelessness or spite, lost one of the letters intended to her, and it was picked up by the Dutchess, mother of Augusta, before the maid could recover it.

The duke and dutchess were constant with rage at this discovery, and poured forth their indignation in unstinted volume. So high did feeling run in the court that the ducal chamberlain challenged the Frenchman to a duel, and the lover fell, mortally wounded. As he fell, the Frenchman tore open his tunic, and there, pressed against his heart, was a handkerchief belonging to the princess. Toward it his hand feebly moved, and he died at the moment he had seized the lace and was struggling to carry it to his lips.

His death was so affected by the incident that she silently placed the handkerchief in the breast of the young man as he lay in the coffin, and it was buried with him. His body was covered with roses, strewn upon him by the devoted Augusta, and she, from swoons and sobs, became hysterical and almost crazed. For weeks the princess sobbed about the palace until her parents were convinced that her sorrow must have relief or she would become insane.

They suggested a marriage with Prince William of Prussia, and the princess gave her indifferent consent, careless and thoughtless what might become of her. With William it was a matter of equal unimportance, for he had first been crossed in love affairs, and he was heartbroken as well.

There was no misunderstanding between them on the subject of their marriage. It was an affair exclusively of the parents and of an obedient but disconsolate youth and maiden. During their lifetime the Emperor William and the Empress Augusta maintained toward each other the most perfect and severe politeness. They were friends, they respected each other, but that was all. They were not lovers, and they could not tear from their hearts the memories of their early love and their early disappointment. The empress always preferred French books, ideas, dress, and sentiment, and it was her favorite language. The influence of that unhappy loss remained with her until the last moment, and she doubtless carried the sweet regrets to the grave. Years have effaced the remembrance of the affair, and it is safe to say that less than a dozen great persons know of it today.

The Speaker's Power. In many ways the speaker of the house is more powerful than even the president of the United States, says the Washington letter to the Pittsburgh Dispatch. The president can veto legislation; but that is a serious matter to resist on a section a law which has been enacted by the exercise of the wisdom of 325 members of the house and 78 members of the senate.

It is an assumption of superior sagacity for which a president rarely cares to take the responsibility, and when he does it is almost invariably at the request of a large proportion of the members of congress, just as the queen of Great Britain does not exercise the veto power except by the request of parliament.

But the speaker of the house may block legislation in a thousand ways, and to a great extent he can veto or mar the influence and prominence of any member of the house. He is practically the creator of the rules of the house. His construction of the rules can thereby be vitiated by the vote of a majority of the house, and upon those of his own party who do not vote to sustain him he can quietly but successfully visit the full extent of his displeasures.

Even the most prominent and brilliant may be snuffed out, and the speaker may not discover to any except those who are exceedingly keen observers the fact that he is deliberately ignoring the person who has aroused his dislike. And as to legislation, a speaker who has thorough command of himself and of the rules can absolutely defeat the enactment of any law which does not suit him, and that almost without exposing the fact to anyone that he is set against it.

The speaker gets $8,000 a year, the same salary as the vice-president of the United States, who is also, by virtue of his office, the presiding officer of the senate. He is also allowed a private secretary at a salary of a little more than $2,000 and a similar salary is paid to a special clerk for the "speaker's table."

Mr. Spurgeon's Condition. LONDON, Jan. 24.—Advices from Mentone say there has been a further improvement in the case of Mr. Spurgeon, and that he is now able to leave that place.
