THE HAG'S REVENGE.

There is a house in Poverty flat which is haunted—or so they say down there, and any one who has seen the house will agree with them...

But neither story or house have lost anything of interest through the lapse of time, and the one is told and the other pointed out to all whom chance or curiosity may bring to the spot.

Regularly every night at 12 o'clock, the visitor is told, a ghostly procession may be seen, by anyone having the hardihood to approach, to pass in succession every window in the building.

When one asks the reason of this strange procession he is told this story: Years ago there lived in this house an old woman and a beautiful young girl.

It was about this time that a young trapper came to the settlement, and, catching a glimpse of the girl, fell in love with her.

The old woman was alarmed to see the young man, and her plan was that she should make her escape by water, the lover stealing up in a boat under the cover of the night.

The hour named found the young fellow at the window. Rising in the boat he tapped gently upon the window pane—the signal agreed upon.

The young trapper stood amazed for a moment, utterly at a loss to know what to make of such strange proceedings.

put his arms about the young girl. The action caused the body to lean slightly, and as it did so the lovely young head rolled from the plump shoulders and fell to the floor.

The awful truth flashed over the young fellow in an instant, and he saw revealed the depths of the old hag's true nature. She had discovered the plot, and in her diabolical rage had murdered the girl, and then given her the semblance of life by propping her against the bureau with the severed head glued in its own blood to its body.

With a cry of indefinite pain the young trapper pressed the lifeless form to his breast and started staggering out of the house. But before he had taken many steps he fell dead—his grief had broken his heart.

Beating Down the Caterer.

From the Pioneer Press. "There are women, and again there are women," said a well-known caterer yesterday, "and if you want to learn something about their natures you should be very business. What's bothering me? Well, a short time ago I went out to serve a wedding party, a small one, and everything seemed to go as smoothly as oil.

"This is simply outrageous," "What is outrageous?" said I. "The manner in which you have served this party."

"Well, in what respect?" Put this to the necessity of giving an excuse, she replied: "There isn't a piece of Haviland among the china."

"Do you know a piece of Haviland when you see it?" Receiving an answer in the affirmative, I retorted: "Pick out a piece that isn't Haviland."

"Well, the finger-bowls aren't the best," was the next shot. "They're just as good as you paid for," was my prompt answer. "I understand your little game, madam, and it isn't the first time I have seen it attempted. You wish, now, that you have had the caterer, to beat down the price, but it won't work."

"I gave orders to the head waiter to pack up and left, fearful that my temper would get too much the best of me. She came around to my office afterward and wanted to talk it over, but I wouldn't talk and told the clerk to tell her so. Then she reduced the bill and sent it back with the amount she thought was due.

"It's curious that a woman can't act like a man when it comes to a matter of judgment, but she can't. If she had asked me in the first instance for a reduction I would have made it sooner than have had any trouble, but I had faithfully lived up to the agreement and had served five people more than the number called for without making any extra charge, the entire bill for that matter being an inconsiderable amount, and it aroused me to have the service attacked in such a transparently unjust way."

"Did you receipt the bill?" "Well, I should say not. It will be paid you may be sure, but I was just showing you how queerly women can act once in a while; as a rule they are the best people in the world to transact business with. But their breaks are so noticeable because so entirely different from those made by men."

"What the Ladies Talk About. From the Philadelphia Inquirer. Last evening two gentlemen, members of a well known club, engaged in conversation as to the nature of conversation ladies indulged in when alone together. One maintained that dress was the universal topic. The other, while admitting that the subject of personal adornment to some extent engrossed the female mind, contended that when among themselves they conversed on other and more intellectual topics as well. The discussion waxed warm, and as neither would give in, it was agreed to submit the matter to the ladies themselves in this way: The two club members were to go out on the street and listen as closely as courtesy would permit to the conversation of the first three groups composed exclusively of ladies which passed. To make the matter more interesting, each gentleman backed his opinion by a bet of $5. Then they went out on the street and this is what happened: Two ladies came by, earnestly talking. One said: "One said: 'I was in a quandary, so I just bought a black and white gingham!'"

"Three ladies appeared next, and the gentleman distinguished: "Joe's bonnet didn't suit her complexion at all!"

"Are you satisfied?" asked the man on the side of dress of his opponent. "No," was the reply. "Wait till we hear what the next say."

Four ladies were the "next," and as they came within earshot this was what was heard: "The thought it at— mentioning a well-known store."

The champion of women's intellectual conversation paid over his $5 without a murmur.

Bismarck's "Black Horseman."

From the Argonaut. A familiar figure known as the "Black Horseman" has disappeared from Berlin since Prince Bismarck's departure. He was the chancellor's private courier, and had been in his employ since 1865. His real name was Ludwig Lewerstrom. During the Austrian and Franco-Prussian wars he served the prince, and was the only German witness of the meeting between his master and the emperor of the French, on the morning of September 2, 1871, which completed the humiliation of Napoleon III and practically closed the war. He carried important messages during the days at Versailles, when the articles of capitulation were being prepared, and the same dark figure galloped incessantly between the palaces of Emperor William I and Emperor Frederick and the home of the chancellor during the periods, not so far apart, when the German rulers lay at the point of death. The fact that the courier was usually clothed in black gave him the name of the "Black Horseman."

One of Joe Brown's Pikes.

From the New York Times. Morell post No. 144, G. A. R., of Sing Sing, was Monday evening last presented by Leonard R. Turner with one of the pikes which Gov. Joseph E. Brown had made at the beginning of the war. This relic, of which only three or four are known to be in existence, is about eight feet long. The steel head is 15 inches in length, with a cross piece. A lot of these pikes were sent to Savannah to be used in the defense of Fort Pulaski, but they were never brought into service. Most of them were subsequently burned at Milledgeville, Ga.

HEATING COFFEE BY ELECTRICITY.

From the Engineering News. Electricity is used for heating as well as lighting at a restaurant and cafe in Berlin. The electric light bulbs of delicate glass and throws out tinted rays favorable to ladies of delicate complexion. Coffee is made in glass jars, in which special platinum wires heat the water to boiling. From this coffee in made and distributed to the various tables on a small electric railway.

What His Speeches Lack.

From the Washington Post. There is a congressman who is noted at his home for sustained effort as well as ability in oratory. "I consider him a very able man," said a railroad official in speaking of him, "but there is one thing that his speeches seem to lack." "What?" "Proper terminal facilities."
