WHERE SIX GENERALS FELL.

General Hood's Fierce Charge Across the Franklin Plain.

We had pressed the enemy for miles upon miles, and at last had them in a trap with a river in their rear. At the sound of a gun in our center, which was the signal, our movement began—officers, both field and staff and line, in their assigned places, by Hood's order, leading. For some distance we moved down in line of battle, the bands enlivening the martial scene.

The fire of the enemy was terrific; officers and men went down in great rows. Lowering surged at the bluff and hedge, and fell back immediately under the parapet. Mortal men could not pass that hedge. Clourne and Brown had swept like a wave, and carried all in front. Adams, Gordon and Strahl held the works in the center. Firing was intense, but no artillery on our side helped the din of battle.

The battle of Franklin had been fought and the federal Army had escaped. He held the field, but at what a tremendous cost. Six generals, and over 100 field officers lay there as a result. Our loss was tremendous for the length of time we were engaged. Our dead and wounded were never numbered—corporals commanded companies, captains commanded regiments and colonels commanded regiments the next morning.

What Americans buy in Europe. I recently accompanied an American on a shopping expedition, his object being to purchase some present to take with him back to his native land. After securing several parcels, consisting of trinkets and newly invented articles, the shopkeeper handed him a pin, saying: "This celluloid jewelry sells as well as the most articles which come from America."
