THE HERALD OF FATE.
By CHARLES DWIGHT WILLARD.
It was late in the afternoon of the twenty-fifth that the panic again seized him, and the courage with which he had determined to meet and overthrow his superstitious fancies suddenly evaporated. The succession of proofs rose before him like the vision of kings to Macbeth. But one part of the message remained unfulfilled: that he should go to sea on the twenty-sixth and there meet his death. And he was going to meet fate instead of avoiding the chance of transportation. No power could carry him on shipboard if he refused to go, and there was no reason why he should not delay the proposed voyage. The doctor especially warned him to avoid worry and excitement, and by deciding to go on some other date he could save himself this agitation, foolish it was, to be sure, but none the less positive.

This is a sort of a dangerous trip.
"Why, how is that?" inquired the merchant, nervously.
"We are carrying about all the gunpowder and oil and such combustibles that the policy will allow. If we should catch fire now it would not take long to blow us skyward."
Mr. Rogers said but little, not being nature a very companionable man. With the pursuer it was different; it was not often that he secured so attentive a listener as his present one.

"Are you going to stop in Ventura very long?" he inquired.
"No," answered the other.
"Well, you ought to," said the pursuer; "everything is beautiful down there now. The hills are a velvety green and the meadows are fairly carpeted with wild flowers. Spring begins a little earlier than it does up above, and it is already well under way."
For winter's rains and rains are over. And all the season of snows and sleet. I suppose you do not care much for poetry, but I am very fond of it, and try to commit some to memory every day; to use for quotations, you know. Those lines are from Swinburne."
"Swinburne," repeated Rogers mechanically. Then he gave a quick glance about the room, and his eyes fell on the shade pale. Here was the desk, the white painted walls, and the mirror.
The pursuer stood up, interrupting his thoughts.
"Yes," he said, "I am very fond of Swinburne; so much so that I keep a calendar in my room with a selection for each day of the year. By Jove! That reminds me! Yesterday I did it."
He placed his hand on a coat which hung over the desk beside the mirror, and was about to remove it when the officer of the desk stepped to the door.
"Hall," he said, "you are wanted," and then added in an undertone which Rogers heard quite plainly, "trouble down below."
The pursuer went quickly out, closing the screen door behind him. Rogers started up and drew the coat to one side. Beneath it was the calendar bearing in large red letters the number twenty-six and the lines:
In his heart is a blind desire,
In his eyes foreknowledge of death.
The words seemed to sear his eyeballs as he read them, and he staggered back, gasping for breath. At that instant he heard the clang of the fire alarm bell, the cries of the sailors, and the rushing of many people along the deck. He sank to the floor, his lips parted in the effort to speak a name.

When the pursuer returned, after adjusting the difficulty for which he had been summoned below, he noticed the men putting up the hose at the conclusion of the fire drill, and wondered if the sudden call had started his guest. Upon the floor of the room he found Capt. Rogers, his stern features black and distorted in death.

The Evangelists and the Churches.
[New York Examiner.]
Mr. Hugh O. Pentecost, once a Christian minister, but now an avowed atheist who declares that he does not understand what people mean by God, is on record as saying that "the church is the enemy of Jesus, the foe of the truth, the defender and abettor of every respectable thief and receiver of stolen goods, the incarnation of hypocrisy, and as cruel as the grave." That is, perhaps, not a surprising declaration, considering its source. But it is surprising when Christian workers, lay and ministerial, publicly make statements like this in spirit and differing from it little in bitterness.

IN WASHINGTON.
One of Our Boys Does the Capital City, and Writes His Impressions With the Attractiveness of a Regular Traveler.
NEW YORK CITY, Sept. 22, 1889.
Errors HERALD:—To be in constant contact, year in and year out in the scenes of a busy professional life with the desire to see at least the most interesting things of one's country, and on the other hand to meet the reluctance of parting even briefly with old friends and associates and those dearer still, has been my greatest dilemma. But now that I am brought to a realization of this positively passing crisis, will note briefly such features and impressions of my trip as would hope to be of most interest to your readers.
Leaving Louisville on the evening of the 17th inst., just in twenty-four hours we were dashed into the Union Depot at Washington City, and to this event my memory shall ever revert with mingled feelings of surprise and pleasure. Down in Ohio and Davies I had grown up from some unaccountable force of circumstances to be entitled to plain "minister" and sometimes "doctor" in common courtesy of address, but to be greeted and handed around at the national capital as "colonel" was utterly beyond the vision of my loftiest boyhood dream and must confess that this very sudden transition in nomenclature struck me, and while I have ever felt loyal, I now appreciate more grandly than ever the privilege of being an American citizen. While a great many of your readers have seen me and are familiar with Washington monuments, perhaps a few points relative to the magnitude of this world's renowned structure would be of interest. The base of this monument is one hundred and twenty-six feet and six inches square, extending seven feet and eight inches below the ground and fifteen feet, eight inches above the composition of which is blue gneiss rock. The face of the shaft which is composed of white marble of a quality so pure that it stands a dazzling glittery spectacle in the sunshine. The total height of this great structure, which is not known to have an equal rival in the world is five hundred and thirty-five feet above the ground floor and its massive weight is eighty-one thousand, one hundred and twenty tons. An iron staircase now connects the interior of the shaft to its top, which for the benefit of footmen is constantly lighted by gas, and when I tell my friends that I ascended these nine hundred steps without a pause they will marvel at the idea, and will at once infer that this is no particular manifestation of natural physical endurance upon my part, but the mere spontaneous outgrowth of this sudden invitation to temporary "colonelship" before mentioned. At the top of this giddy height, there are eight windows two by three feet, looking out from the roof of the artist to the beautiful Washington on the one hand while the placid waters of the Potomac smile at you upon the other. Many places on the interior of the walls the decorations of the tobacco chasers are too prominently presented to the eyes and nostrils to make the journey an altogether pleasant one, and the fellow who inscribes his name along with that of his girth upon these walls, has been conspicuously numerous. There is a probability that many who climb to the weary top, have learned the story of Washington and his persistent and finally successful attempt to cut his name above all others on the soft rock of the natural bridge. My visit here recalls to the artist to the old time school reader and the ambitious fellow standing on his comrade's back, and writes with a proud flourish his name high above those who preceded him. Several feet above hand reach, are these names, both on the outer and inner walls, and they come from all parts of the world. Obscene inscriptions, we regret to say, are not here an uncommon thing to behold. The poet who is to be found everywhere, has made known his presence by saying boldly that
"Washington was a mighty man;
To him all this is erected,
But he who climbs up here to see,
Must be a fool perfected."
The monument is not only accessible by stairway, but an elevator of ten tons capacity with a safety factor of fifteen tons is always at your service by which you may reach the top in twenty minutes. To look down upon a man of average stature from this lofty attitude, he dwindles to a mere speck under your gaze and resembles a turkey gobbler quite nearly as much as the human species, and the female is only distinguishable by being a bird of brighter plumage. We now run through the Capitol building, and were to enter into detail in this sketch upon a building of such magnitude involving as it does the finest building material, the most magnificent design, and the grandest of architectural skill in execution, would be writing you into a most deplorable frazzle, which at present we have no inclination to do. In the Executive Mansion, State War and Navy Department, Soldiers Home, Post Office Department, Agricultural Department, Patent Office, Smithsonian Institute, the National and Medical Museums and many other places too numerous to mention, one may ever find agreeable pastime, and see again and again with never ending profit and pleasure.

Coming to Washington over the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and along whose route there is not on the continent, perhaps grander landscapes, nor more varied and magnificent scenery.

We stopped at Deer Park, Md., a famous summer resort, where for the first time in life we had the privilege of beholding a Republican President. We sought not to effect an audience with the chief magistrate as we felt the warm Democratic blood flowing through our veins, knowing full well that this factor alone would stand up boldly as the calms hand of fate between us and the smallest "plum" of the present administration. That course in Ben is a little off in the political doctrine that strikes our weakness most forcibly, is the severest judgment upon this grand old gentleman.

Deer Park with her smiling lakes, shady lawns, lovely valley, frowning mountains, gushing springs and handsome cottages, is the summer abode of many in Washington's high circles who repose in peace and splendor during the heated term. Should we ever be the ungrateful occupant of the Chief Magistrate's chair, book us for the full term at Deer Park, and three hundred and sixty-five days in each year. Let our bulletin board read: "No callers—gone a-fishing."
God bless the Hartford HERALD; it was the first friend to greet me in New York. More anon and of other things.

State Bureau of Immigration and Information.
[Frankfort Capital].
Those who have given the matter careful study are convinced that the next step for Kentucky to take in her progressive march, is the enactment of a wise immigration law. To this end, the following circular has been prepared by the State League of Commercial Clubs and a copy forwarded to each member of the next General Assembly: "Dear Sir:—The State Commercial League, composed of the Commercial Clubs and the Boards of Trade throughout the State, desires to secure your favorable consideration of a bill which will come before the next Legislature designed to establish a State Bureau of Immigration and Information. Within the past two years Kentucky has made great natural progress, and a spirit of activity and enterprise has been aroused in every portion of the Commonwealth. Experience proves that one of the chief elements in contributing to the wealth and importance of a State is a wise immigration law, which seeks to bring desirable people of all classes, from the artisan to the capitalist, within its borders. In some Kentucky counties where colonies have been established in the last few years, a large increase in the assessed value of property and a gratifying development of latent resources have resulted. The last meeting of the Kentucky Press Association unanimously adopted a resolution favoring an official plan for bringing population and wealth into the State, and every editor in the State has given it his hearty indorsement through his paper. The movement is purely one for the general welfare of the State in line with the plans and ideas which have been so generally taken up. We invite your matured consideration to the subject, feeling confident that your good judgment will lead you to give it a hearty approval."

"I have used Ayer's Cherry Pectoral with the best effect in my practice. This wonderful preparation once saved my life. "Several years ago I was severely ill. The doctors said I was in consumption, and that they could do nothing for me, but advised me, as a last resort, to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. Success Requires Cheek.
Two well-known men met near the court house the other morning. "I can't understand it," one of them was heard to say; "Here you are worth about $70,000 and I ain't worth a cent. I believe I am just as smart as you."
"The difference," said the other, "is this; you are modest while I have cheek. You wait till some one comes and pulls you out; I force myself to the front. My success may be wholly owing to my push."

HOWARD AND JENNINGS.
Adj. Hill Tells of His Interview With The Boys Who are Charged With Grave Crimes.
FRANKFORT, Sep. 34.—Adjutant Gen. Hill arrived in the city yesterday from Camp Gaither in Harlan county.
Gen. Hill relates the incidents of his interview with Will Jennings and Wilson Howard. He says he was notified that a relative of Howard proposed to have a bear hunt, and his informant, in extending the invitation to him to join in the bear hunt, said:
"General, you better go out there and take part. If you don't find no hars you might find some men you're looking for."
Acting upon the hint, he and Capt. Gaither rode out at 9 o'clock at night, and with the aid of a guide, reached the house at 1 o'clock. The country over which the route lay was very rough, up and down and across mountains, and the Cumberland river, a distance of between twelve and fifteen miles from Mt. Pleasant. They were hospitably received and cared for at a house of Howard's relative, and in the morning assembled in the sitting-room with a number of the family and friends of the Howards. Presently, two fine looking handsome, well-dressed and newly-shaved young men entered the room, and caused Gen. Hill and Capt. Gaither to open their eyes in astonishment to hear the host say: "This is Mr. Jennings and this Mr. Howard, gentlemen."
In a few moments, a note was handed to Gen. Hill, which stated that Mr. Jennings and Mr. Howard would refer to the room and hold a conference with him and Capt. Gaither on the subject of delivering themselves up to the Harlan county authorities for trial. Thither Gen. Hill and Capt. Gaither repaired, when Jennings and Howard said that a requisition had been issued for them by Gov. Francis, of Missouri, and that they would willingly go to Missouri and stand trial for the crime charged against them there, if Gov. Buckner would pardon them for their offenses in Kentucky. Gen. Hill told them that he could not speak for Gov. Buckner on that score, but that he could advise them, even as a matter of personal interest and welfare, that it would be best for them to stand their trial here; that they were now only two men contending against all the forces of organized society, and that whilst they may elude the law for awhile they are almost certain, in the end, by their resistance to a trial, to prejudice and army public opinion against them, and bring on a vengeance which their obedience to the law now might assuage or avert. Jennings and Howard both then avowed themselves ready to stand trial, but feared they would not receive fair treatment in Mt. Pleasant, and requested Gen. Hill to guarantee them protection. This promise Gen. Hill made for them, and returned to Mt. Pleasant the next day. Whether Howard and Jennings deliver themselves up remains to be seen; but Gen. Hill inclines to the belief that they will do it. The requisition from Missouri was received, but returned by Gov. Buckner, under the answer that the men were now under indictment by the courts of Kentucky, and must first stand their trial here.
