NADA THE LILY.

By H. RIDER HAGGARD.

[Copyright, 1892, by Tiltonson & Son and published by special arrangement with them.]

opened eyes with the Boers, and more especially with that Boer who was named Ungaburkulu, or Great Arm. I showed the Boer that Dingaan was wicked and not to be believed, but Panda was faithful and good. The end of it was that the Boers and Umpanda made war together on Dingaan.

The finished it, my father, for they feared to stand against us both, the white and the black together. They fled and we followed and slew, and Dingaan ceased to be a king.

He ceased to be a king, but he yet lived, and while he lived our vengeance was hungry. So we went to the Boer captain and to Panda and spoke to them nicely, saying: "We have served you well; we have fought for you and so ordered things that victory is yours. Now grant us this request---that we may follow Dingaan, who has fled into hiding, and slay him wherever we find him, for he has worked us wrong and we would avenge it."

Then the white captain and Panda smiled and said: "Go, children, and prosper in your search. No one thing shall please us more than to know that Dingaan is dead." And they gave us men to go with us.

Then we hunted him week by week, as men hunt a wounded buffalo. We lay hid in the bush watching. At last our chance came. Dingaan walked in the bush, and with him two men only. We slew the men and seized him.

Now Dingaan prayed for mercy. "Mercy? thou hyena!" I answered. "Thou prayest for mercy who showed none to any. Give me back my daughter. Give this man back his wife and children. Then we will talk of mercy. Come forth, coward, and die the death of cowards."

So, my father, we dragged him forth groaning, to the cleft that is above in the breast of the old Stone Wall, that cleft where Galazi had found the bones. There we stood waiting for the moment of the dawn, that moment when Nada had died. Then we cried her name into his ears and the names of the children of Umslopogias and cast him into the cleft.

That is the tale of Nada the Lily, my father, and how we avenged her.
