ABOUT BOX RENTS

The postmaster is troubled at the first of each quarter as to what to do in those cases where box rents are not promptly paid. The government allows the patron ten days in which to pay the rent. After that the instructions are explicit that the box must be declared vacant and the mail placed in the general delivery. The department listens to no excuses from the postmaster but compels him to make good any rent not paid if he allows the box to be used after the ten days have elapsed. Of course the vast majority pay promptly, but there are also a number of tardy ones, some of whom wax wrathful when the postmaster does what is required of him by the regulations.
