Story Telling Pictures.

Art for art's sake had a doughty champion in the late James Whistler and the following which insisted upon his view have managed to nearly drown the cry of those who ask for pictures that say something human. The critics who insist upon technique had the advantage, for in discussing art and setting its standard they were on their own ground. They declared that to ask for pictures which mean something was to demand literature and not art. Recently the head of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, Sir Purdon Clarke, has taken up the cudgel for the laymen. Said he:

"They talk about tone pictures, which are all technique, and nothing else. But what's the use of a picture if it does not tell a story or convey an impression? To paint pictures in order to show off technique is on a par with making a chair which can't be sat in. Neither serves a purpose except it be to express the soul of the artist or cabinetmaker."

If the manager of the great collection in New York carries out this view he will find the museum crowded with Americans who want to be thrilled and lifted up by art. Studies in color, in lines and in tone do not appeal to everyday people. In every broad exhibition of pictures the crowds will be seen lingering about the speaking pictures which have for a subject the newsboy, the fisherman, the colored mammy, the sailor or the pioneer. Smiling, weeping or frowning, they tell a story of joy or pain. The poet whose songs become "the songs of a people" sings from the heart to the art. The painter who wants to put upon art its share of the burden of uplifting humanity must paint from the heart to the heart. The masses will pass by an old master and linger enraptured before "The Angelus." One is a relic of the mythical past, the other bears in every line the touch of nature put there, yea, yesterday. One is dead, the other vital.

A Manly Sport.

The curse of professionalism has not yet settled down upon college boating in this country. It remains sport for sport's sake and for the individual runs its course with the college career. The men row a few races and then have done with college rowing, for others come to the front to represent their college. The annual races on the Hudson are democratic in the true sporting sense. Seven colleges were represented this year—Columbia, Pennsylvania, Syracuse, Wisconsin, Georgetown, Cornell and Annapolis.

The annual races on the Hudson compete in national interest with the Yale-Harvard race at New London. Attention centers each year upon the work of some new crew or new crews, and the honors pass from college to college and from section to section. Perhaps these contests will lead to the establishing of a crew picked from the colleges according to some standard which will give it a unique character.

The historic Fifth Avenue hotel, New York, long the political headquarters of Tom Platt and some others, must yield to the march of improvement and disappear. But a lot of things that were started by confabs in its corridors will keep going on for decades to come.

Kentucky Feudist Calmly Tells History of His Crimes.

KILLED A MAN AT FIFTEEN.

Shot Two More When He Was Seventeen—He Is Credited With Eighteen Homicides, but Modestly Disclaims That Record—Now a Detective.

A correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial Tribune has just visited the interesting home of John W. Wright, the celebrated mountain Kentucky detective, fighter and leader in the Wright faction of the Jones-Wright feud, which raged during the eighties in Letcher and Knott counties.

John Wright lives in a snug and comfortable little mountain cabin back on the headwaters of Elkhorn creek with a wife and two children. He receives his sustenance from the proceeds of a 300 acre mountain farm and occasionally captures a fugitive from justice, bringing in a handsome reward.

Wright possesses a tall figure of square build. He has an even temper, a smiling countenance and is the type of a man to whom children are unconsciously attracted.

When asked to tell the story of his life he readily consented, beginning as follows: "I was born about sixty years ago in a hut on the famous old Joel Wright farm, on the extreme headwaters of the Kentucky river, and up to the age of fifteen I attended the district schools, three miles down the river. I had an old rifle and enjoyed myself shooting game of all kinds, which abounds in that section. I was considered the best shot in the county and won all the big things in the shooting matches, common in that day. At length an attempt was made to debar me from participating in the matches. Of course I protested, and Floyd Hall, a relative of the late Talt Hall, and I had an altercation. Several shots were exchanged.

"WE MET, HALL AND I, ON THE PUBLIC ROAD."

"By and by we met, Hall and I, on the public road. The old grudge was revived. We opened fire and fired almost simultaneously. I got the best of him, and Hall died with a bullet through his head. This was in March, 1862.

"In the spring of 1863, I was arrested by the Confederates under command of General John H. Morgan near Pound Gap, and I was made a prisoner. At first I was taken to Richmond, Va., and put in prison. Later I was transferred to Camp Douglas, Ill., on the present site of the city of Chicago.

"The hardships of prison life were terrible. At length more dead than alive, Dec. 4, 1863, I climbed over the high walls that encircled the prison, hustled myself away as fast as my legs could take me, and at daylight the next morning I was far from the scene. I was never recaptured.

"In Camp Douglas I met Talt Hall, afterward one of the most noted feud fighters in the history of eastern Kentucky, and a union of brotherly love was made between us, which lasted until I saw him executed at Wise, Va., in 1893 for the murder of Amos Hylton.

"In all things Hall was my friend. In 1865 I was on route to Prestonsburg, Ky., when I came upon two horse thieves. In less time than it takes to tell it I 'did' them both and took the horses, returning them to the owners. Upon my return I was fired upon from ambush, having a close call.

"In 1867 I went to Hawkins county, Tenn., and engaged in selling moonshine whisky in defiance of the law. During my two years' stay there I killed two men, but I did it in self defense.

"Leaving Tennessee, I went to the west, locating in Taylor county, Tex. During my sojourn in Texas I became infatuated with a young girl barely sixteen, and because her father was abusing me I killed him and his son.

"I then returned to Kentucky. There were no events of note then until in the early seventies, when bitter warfare was engendered between Clabe Jones of Knott county and myself. My friends joined me, likewise his friends—the Dranghans, Sloans, Joneses and Combes.

"On the morning of July 10, 1882, myself and twenty men, brave as ever lived and good fighters, set out afoot for Hindman, Knott county, Clabe Jones' stronghold.

"They were provided with guns and munitions to double my expectations, though we walked into the center of the main street of the town and gave them an invitation to fight. The firing was begun, and a fierce battle resulted.

"It was a rousing victory for my men, as we only lost two to Jones' four—with two dangerously wounded.

"Leaving Hindman, we started on our return home. Two days later my men were re-enforced by twelve men and a new supply of munitions.

"We went into Knott county and got on the track of Jones and his men, following them to Mallet Fork of Beaver, where a battle resulted.

"My loss was four instead of six, as claimed by the opposing forces. They lost three killed and one wounded. Jones' men followed us unawares into Letcher county, and at daybreak the following morning opened fire upon us from a high bluff overlooking the mouth of Boone's Fork. We were stationed below. A fierce battle followed. Two of my men were wounded. The following day one of my men, Roscoe McCoy, a great fighter, was assassinated while riding along the public road on Rockhouse creek, near where Bill Cook was killed a year before.

"On Jan. 10 we met again on Rockhouse creek, near where McCoy was ambushed. In the battle there I commanded forty brave men; Jones thirty. Neither of us have ever told our losses, but they were great.

"The next battle was fought on Carr's Fork creek, in Knott county. Jones lost three men; I lost two.

"For five years longer occasional battles were fought in the two counties until the last battle on Carr's Fork in May, 1889, when a peace agreement was reached by Clabe and I. In this battle we lost two men each and shook hands."

Here Wright hesitated and when queried about the probable renewal of the feud said:

"No, we are at peace and will never clash again. Why, Clabe and I are the best of friends. He visits me in my home, and I go to see him often."

"How many men have you killed?" was asked.

"I am credited with having killed eighteen during my career, but I have never killed that number, not by a lot."

AS BOY, GIRL HANGS HERSELF

Had Been Arrested For Offering Bad Check in a Missouri Bank.

Miss Pearl Silence, sixteen years old, committed suicide near Aurora, Mo., by hanging herself after an attempt to cash a worthless check.

Dressed in boy's clothing, the girl appeared in the Citizens' bank in Ava and presented a check for $10, purporting to have been signed by P. A. Johnson. The cashier telephoned to Mr. Johnson, who declared the check a forgery. Miss Silence was arrested and released on bond, furnished by her grandfather.

On the way to the girl's home Miss Silence, who was riding horseback, disappeared. Her grandfather was walking, and she rode ahead and was lost to sight. Her body was found later hanging from an oak tree.

"What I want is the law on my sister-in-law," said Mrs. Sarah Kores of 21 Rock street, in the Manhattan avenue police court, Brooklyn, when she appeared against Mrs. Bertha Waschaw of 13 Rock street.

"Why?" asked Magistrate O'Reilly.

"Because she hit me on the right eye."

"I don't see any marks," commented the magistrate.

Mrs. Kores replied that she had evidence in plenty, and with a quick movement extracted the eye from the socket.

"Just look at that, your honor; it's cracked."

Mrs. Kores showed the magistrate a glass eye, very much the worse for wear. It was cracked.

"Examination set down for Friday; charge assault," said the magistrate as he paroled Mrs. Waschaw.

WOMEN TO PLAY BALL

University Summer School to Teach Them Essentials of Baseball.

A course in baseball for women is one of the latest novelties in a university curriculum. This course, which is given for the first time this year in any university, is being conducted by the department of physical training of the New York university summer school and was introduced to meet a big demand on the part of women to learn the essentials of the national game, for women and girls are no longer content to let the men and boys monopolize this game and are beginning not merely to have a desire to know why a batter is out on the third strike, but also to play the game themselves. In fact, a special adaptation of baseball is already being played by thousands of girls, who have regular teams and interclass and interschool series. The game as played by the girls is known as indoor baseball and is played with a large ball and is less violent in its demands. The rules, however, are much the same, and the girls who play the indoor game can go to the outdoor game and understand the niceties of bunts and stealing and doubles as well as their little brothers who are no less ardent fans.

The university summer school, therefore, in its courses for women teachers of physical training and playground directors has instituted special training which will enable the women to coach indoor teams. Some of the women teachers, however, explained that they would like to learn something of the outdoor regular game because they could in this way help boys at their playgrounds who could not get men to coach their nines. In consequence many of these women teachers are being taken out on the university diamond and taught the theory of standing at the bat, of handling grounders and of playing the different positions. The women of course do not actually play the outdoor game. When asked if she could teach pitching one of the women replied: "I have learned the theory of making a ball curve, and I can show this to my boys. But for women with their unaccustomed shoulders actual pitching is an impossibility. Still I think that it will help my playground for me to know how ball ought to be played, even if I can't play it expertly myself. And by being able to talk intelligently about their pet games I get into much closer touch with them."

SOCIETY'S PET FLOWER.

Women of Smart Set In Rivalry Over Cultivation of Dahlias.

Whatever the shortcomings of the Four Hundred the members of this overadvised body cannot be charged with neglect of flowers, says the New York Press. It is a hopeful sign in a woman to find her fond of flowers, and women of the Four Hundred seldom have been seen in a happier light than at present, when they are engaged in rivalry over the cultivation of dahlias.

The dahlia is a common plant in Europe, in many parts growing wild. It is a rarer plant in the United States, and as it belongs almost exclusively in the hothouse it has been developed to a beauty not approached in the most favorite spot abroad. There is some doubt as to the one who receives the credit for the sudden growth in popularity of the plant. The Vanderbilt conservatories are now stocked with it. Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt has marked the dahlia as her favorite flower, and so with Mrs. Clarence Mackay, Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney is another lover of the dahlia, chiefly because of its rainbow tints and its rare value for decorative purposes.

Mrs. Mackay seems to have the lead in the friendly rivalry just now, for she has a dozen plants of truly surpassing beauty. The hearts of the flowers are of variegated brown, with the long, soft, golden petals tapering off to white. The secret of the variety belongs alone to Mrs. Mackay and the Mackay horticulturist, and the Mackay country place in Roslyn finds an adornment even more alluring than the dahlia effects in the Vanderbilt and Whitney homes.

No man has poked more or better fun at knights and lords than W. S. Gilbert, author of "Pinafore." Now King Edward has made him one of the bunch in spite of himself.

London doctors assert that eggs as articles of diet are not worth their post. Evidently American doctors are in league with the great American hen.
