Every once in a while some insurance company meets with a death loss, pays it promptly enough, as it should, and then rushes to the nearest newspaper office like a Plymouth Rock cockerel that has just laid an egg. So far as we can see it is the business of insurance companies to pay death losses; it is about the only expense they have except the fat salaries and commissions they pay and the piling up of enormous surpluses. It would be just as proper for the Review to ask for a vote of thanks each week because it has issued a paper, as it is for insurance companies to expect widows to kiss their hands and newspapers to give them puffs because they pay their death losses. If you know of some insurance company or fraternal order that does not pay its death losses let us know—that would be news.
