MAGIC OF NINA HILLER

By MAX STERNER.

It is not to be written whether Mrs. Huggins was more surprised at the apparition which appeared in her shabby sitting room or whether Nina Hiller, personifying the apparition, was more surprised at the prevailing slovenliness of the place. Certain it was that the dingy room which served as an office for Mrs. Huggins' fifth-class lodging house had never been graced by so neat and smart and altogether charming a person as Miss Hiller. Certain it also was that Nina never had dreamed there were so many unutterable kinds of dirt as she saw about her.

Mrs. Huggins was inclined at first to be a bit belligerent, but Nina's perfect frankness and gentleness disarmed her. As for Nina, her lips trembled just for the fraction of a moment as she contrasted the cheerless place with the neat and comfortable country home she had left.

"Do you have furnished rooms to rent?" she inquired.

"I do," replied Mrs. Huggins shortly. "May I see one?" persisted Nina. "What for?" rejoined Mrs. Huggins. "I am looking for a room," replied the girl.

Mrs. Huggins gasped in surprise. "There's plenty vacant, the Lord knows," she said, "but they ain't hardly your kind."

"I am not very particular so long as the place is respectable and the rent is not high," said the girl.

"Respectable," snorted Mrs. Huggins; "I never ran no place that wasn't respectable."

"I'm sure of that," the girl hastened to say. "I only meant that was why I came here."

"Well, it's cheap enough," went on the landlady. "Goodness knows, it has to be. There ain't seem to be no money any more. I have to take what folks can afford to pay."

Then she looked shyly at the girl and said with rough kindness: "I really think you might find a place you would like better. It's only poor folks that put up here."

"I am very poor," replied Nina simply. Then, noting Mrs. Huggins' keen glances at her neat and tasty clothes, and more especially at her gloves and rather stylish hat, she smiled and added: "I am from the country. My parents died very recently and left me alone, and there was not much left after the bills were paid."

"The city is a poor place to come," replied Mrs. Huggins grimly, but not unkindly. "Goodness knows there's a plenty here now tryin' to keep soul and body together. If you've got any friends in the country you'd better go back and get any kind of work to do to keep an honest roof over your head. There's an army of 'em here walkin' the streets, lookin' for work—and it's a bad business for a young girl and a purty one like you, a-gettin' discouraged and hungry and lonesome and all that."

The girl blushed and smiled a brave, confident little smile.

"I had a good mother and a good father," she said with quiet dignity, "and I am sure I will do nothing to disgrace them. I have no doubt at all but I will find work to do and that I will get on famously."

The upshot of it all was that Nina became established in a dingy room on the second floor with two dingy windows. There was a dingy carpet on the floor and a meager quantity of dingy furniture. There was also a neglected fireplace in the corner. It was all so hopeless and squalid that it required all Nina's courage to face it.

While waiting for her trunk the newcomer went out and returned with an armful of packages which filled the person of Mrs. Huggins with burning curiosity. A boy followed her with a good-sized box. Mysterious sounds came from the room of the new lodger. Presently a coal man carried several sacks of coal to the room. This was the straw that broke the landlady's back, so to speak. She simply had to go up and see what was going on.

As curiosity filled her before she opened the door, astonishment prevailed when she gazed at the transformed apartment. The windows were washed inside and out, the carpet brightened up, all the furniture wiped and cleaned, a dainty coverlet was on the bed and a score of pretty and artistic things were tastefully placed about the room. And in the grate a fire was burning smartly. The entire effect was most homelike and cheerful. Mrs. Huggins could scarcely believe it was her own house. She never had seen anything like it—certainly nothing even suggesting it there.

"Are you goin' to have a fire all the time?" demanded Mrs. Huggins. "Coal does cost a lot."

"I'm going to try to be comfortable," replied the girl. "I think I can earn enough to keep warm and have enough to eat."

The miracle was duly announced to various of the lodgers, as they came in that evening, principally in the form of admonitions given with more or less vehemence by Mrs. Huggins.

"No more rough house in No. 12," she said sharply to Rose and Madge, two bindery girls, who occupied the next room to the new lodger. "Of course I know there ain't been no harm in it, but there's been a lot of noise. Let the fellers take you to a dance if you want to make a racket. As long as we've got a real leddy we won't scare her out."
