DIVORCE IN EGYPT.
Ninety Out of Every Hundred Marriages There End Disastrously.
 There is one country in the world, at least, where divorce is more frequent than in the United States. In Egypt 90 per cent of marriages end in divorce, says Elizabeth Cooper in her book, "The Harim and the Purdah," and it has been observed that two people who live to old age together without one of them having been divorced are rarely found.
 Divorce can be had for incompatibility by mutual consent, Mrs. Cooper says, without recourse to the courts, but if the wife wishes to be free and the husband will not permit it the woman may go before a judge and state her case, and if her charges are proved she will be granted her petition. Often a woman will return her dower or agree to forfeit the part not yet paid, and in many cases the wife makes a money payment to the avaricious husband in return for her liberty.
 Divorce is easier for the Egyptian husband than for the wife, according to Mrs. Cooper, and following a divorce the woman is commanded to remain single three months, while the man may remarry immediately.
