Good Stock Keeping is Just Good Bookkeeping The basis of good bookkeeping is accuracy, both in putting facts on paper and in analyzing results. By the same token, good stock keeping is nothing more nor less than keeping accurate, daily records of incoming and outgoing stock, tabulating the results and using them as a guide in maintaining, replenishing and checking stock. Without a perpetual inventory of your stock, you cannot hope to regulate it with accuracy. Overstocking is just as bad as understocking. Both mean money lost. In keeping customers' accounts, you post debits and credits and extend balances. In keeping stock records, you note how much you put in stock, how much you take out and how much you have left. It makes no difference to a Burroughs Bookkeeping Machine, whether it is dollars, pounds, dozens or quarts. It will handle any units you may have to handle, and show you an automatically computed, accurate balance every day. Figure up the losses due to lack of daily knowledge of what you have in stock and you'll see why a Burroughs Machine pays for itself so quickly. Burroughs Machines perform every detail of good bookkeeping and good stock keeping. They do it easily because the figures are in plain type, because there can't be mistakes in addition or subtraction, because the totals are automatically extended. They do it economically because they are always on the job, simple to operate, free from errors that mean wasted hours, and have practically unlimited capacity for work. When the Burroughs representative calls he will have some valuable information for you about how other business men are getting automatic accuracy and labor saving into their accounting.
