Why Not Shorten the Long, Hot Days?

SCARCITY of labor is not a temporary or a spasmodic condition. It is chronic. And in these days of agitation for shorter hours no man is going to feel the effects of a labor shortage so much as the farmer.

And there is no way in which a farmer can shorten the long, hot days during the cultivating season better than by using a Two-Row Cultivator. With no additional help he can double the cultivating acreage. Under ordinary conditions three horses are sufficient to pull this cultivator, so the farmer operating one saves the time of one man and one horse and does as much work as two men operating two single row cultivators with four horses. The case can be stated in another way: With a Two-Row Cultivator one hired man does the work of two hired men under the old method.

Keep Your Eye on One Row—The Other Takes Care of Itself

There is nothing to criticize in the construction of this cultivator. It is too well made for that. The inner levers are compound in action; some cultivators have six levers to perform the work done by the four levers on this cultivator. Contrary to the opinions of some men who never saw one in the field, the operator does not have to watch both rows at one time. The cultivator follows the rows that were planted in pairs, and the dodging of one row automatically dodges the other row.

Come in and let us show you how it works.
