THE MEETING IN RICHMOND.
The Mass Meeting at the Richmond Theatre.
A vast mixed audience, white and colored, assembled at the Richmond Theatre on Monday night, to hear addresses from Messrs. William H. Macfarland, R. T. Daniel and Marmaduke Johnson, delivered by invitation of Solon Johnson and other colored people of Richmond. The doors were opened at 8 o'clock, and immediately the whole building was crowded by a vast audience, three-fourths of whom were colored, the two races being intermingled throughout the house. Such a scene has never before been witnessed in the South, and never has been or will be seen at the North. The utmost decorum and good order prevailed.

At half past 8 o'clock Messrs. Macfarland, Johnson, Daniel, the Rev. Doctors Woodbridge and Burrows, and the colored committee, came upon the stage, and were greeted with applause by the vast audience.
Soon after Solon Johnson, a tall, well dressed colored man, of easy and dignified deportment, advanced to the front of the stage and introduced Mr. Daniel.

Raleigh T. Daniel, Esq., then arose and addressed the meeting for about forty minutes. He alluded to the necessity of both whites and blacks exercising kind relations towards each other. [Applause.] In alluding to the new political relations which had sprung up, the speaker advocated the propriety of the colored men consulting those who would give them good advice, instead of those whose only aim and object it was to excite ill will between the races. He thought the difficulty in the path of conciliation and harmony was the demagogue; his counsels were insidious and for personal aggrandizement. Slavery was buried in the dead past, never to be revived. It had been carried on in British waters by British vessels. To stop it was one of the causes of the revolutionary war. It was carried on by the colonies and lasted till 1805, when it was carried on by Northern men in Northern vessels. The speaker referred in scathing terms to the heartless desertion of the Northern philanthropists, as practiced in their efforts to win over the colored influence, while at the same time they were not willing to allow them scarcely a foothold on their soil. He wished to know in how many Northern States the colored man was permitted to vote. The speaker referred to the existence of certain secret societies in Richmond, in which it was whispered by bad men that they, the colored men, should be placed in possession of the property owned by white men. If the people of the North ever took away the property of the whites of the South, it would be to enrich themselves and not to give it to the colored men of the South! Mr. Daniel exhorted harmony and good will among the races, as the best promoters of good to both, and maintained that our own white citizens were naturally the best friends the colored people had.

Marmaduke Johnson, Esq., then took the stand, and stated that in obedience to the request of his colored fellow citizens he was present to address them. He was born in the cradle of slavery and had had a "mammy" almost ever since he had had a mother. So long as he had been a citizen he had never received any other than the kindest politeness from the colored man. He advocated peace among the whites and blacks, and believed that it was the wish of all that such a state of feeling should exist. Whatever Congress had granted to the colored man, there was no wish on the part of our citizens to deny them. He next alluded to the nightly meetings which had been held in different sections of the city, and wished to know why it was that Hannibal and others were haranguing them in opposition to their white friends. The white man had held no meetings to put down the colored man; why was it that the reverse had been the case on their part? If a collision of the races ever took place, mark his prediction, that it would be brought on by the blacks. If the colored man desired his elevation, let him cultivate industry and education, as thereby he could make himself a useful citizen and take his place where he was intended. He exhorted the colored population to throw off the hallucination which had come over some of them, that it was their policy to array themselves against the whites, and for the future accept the friendship of their white friends, who had never yet sought to injure them. Mr. Johnson closed with one of those soul-stirring perorations so characteristic of him, and which never fails to bring down the wildest applause.

William H. Macfarland, Esq., next followed. He knew that the feelings of the Southern whites had always been those of the kindest character towards the colored man, and at no time was that kindness more experienced than the present. The desire of the white population was for the promotion and advancement of the colored population, and if they (the colored men) would attain position and respectability, it was their duty to avail themselves of the incentives to do so. He exhorted the colored people to use their energies to become good citizens, or else they would be but little benefited, morally or otherwise, by the freedom which had been extended to them. Their duty was to cultivate an acquaintance with the affairs of the country in which they lived, in order to use properly the elective franchise. He warned the colored men against those strangers who come into our midst and attempt to dictate who they (the colored voters) should support. Was there not a common interest among our citizens, both white and black, and why should the colored race determine not to vote for those who had always lived with them? It was to the people of Virginia, who lived under the same laws with them, and among whom the colored people were always to be, that they should go for advice, and not to the stranger who cared nothing for them except what would rebound to his own personal benefit. The condition of the colored race of the South was infinitely better than that of the workingmen in some foreign countries, and if they neglected their opportunities they would soon sink into lower depths than that of those who were now their inferiors. Mr. Macfarland's speech was calm, practical and to the point.

After long and loud calls, N. A. Sturdivant, Esq., took the stand, and addressed the audience in a strain of humor and satire, which brought down the house and instilled into the minds of all the very best humor. He had lived among the blacks, and did not care to reside in any community where there were none. The condition of the colored race was then referred to, and some wholesome advice administered to them as to what will best conduce to their future happiness and welfare. Mr. Sturdivant, like his predecessors, took the ground that the white and black man of the South were mutually dependent upon each other, and if they pulled together each would be an assistance to the other. Who was it that gave employment to the colored man of the South? Was it not the white citizen, who had always been living here, and with whom the colored man had been for years and years on the most friendly terms? In the course of the speaker's remarks he made some reference to "mean white men," "coolie men," &c., to which latter allusion Burham Wardwell, who was sitting about the centre of the parquette, took exceptions, and rising, inquired whether allusion were made to him, Mr. Sturdivant replied that if the cap fit him he could wear it; whereupon Wardwell again arose and said he should like to be permitted to reply, which privilege was cheerfully accorded him; but he did not accept it. The colloquy was concluded by Mr. Sturdivant's proposing to meet Wardwell in discussion at the African Church, when the expenses of the evening would be paid out of their own private funds! Rev. Dr. Burrows closed the proceedings in an address of about twenty minutes duration. He advised the colored race as to the duties of the hour and thought they had a future before them which needed much care and discretion to meet. The counsels of strangers and bad men should not be accepted; but they should confer among themselves and with our own citizens as to what was best for their good. Those persons who had tried to prejudice the colored people against those of our citizens who were commonly called rebels, should not be heeded, for it could not be denied that such were the people among whom their support was to be earned, and to array themselves in antagonism towards them, was to their race incalculable injury.

Considerable interruption took place during the first of the meeting, which, doubtless, emanated from some of the sneaking white men, who are trying to wheedle the colored people, assisted by a few deluded blacks over whom the fellows had perhaps already gained some influence. Before the close, however, everything became quiet and there was scarcely a colored person in the audience who was not highly pleased and felt that the counsels which had been received were the best after all for them to adopt.—Rich. Times.

Throw away your false frizzes, your swollen, your wig—
Destructive of comfort, and not worth a hair's breadth. It will force the hair to grow upon the smooth face in from five to eight weeks, or hair upon bald heads in from two to three months. A few ignorant practitioners have asserted that there is nothing that will force or hasten the growth of the hair or beard. Their assertions are false, as thousands of living witnesses (but many will say, how are we to distinguish the genuine from the spurious?) certainly is difficult, as nine-tenths of the different preparations advertised for the hair and beard are entirely worthless, and by constant use, do more harm than good. It is better to possess (but many will say, how are we to distinguish the genuine from the spurious?) certainly is difficult, as nine-tenths of the different preparations advertised for the hair and beard are entirely worthless, and by constant use, do more harm than good.
