Three Wealthy New Yorkers.
A correspondent of the Charleston Journal sends the following:

Alexander T. Stewart is a native of the North of Ireland—not of Scotland, as many persons suppose. He is nearly seventy years old, and has been forty years a dry goods merchant in New York. His wealth is estimated at thirty millions, all acquired by untiring application to business. The foundation of his fortune was laid in a small store down town, where he began his mercantile career as a dealer in Irish linens. Most of his success is owing to a rule he established at the start, and which he has faithfully adhered to ever since—to never misrepresent his goods, and never ask more for them than he intended to take. By those who know him only through reputation, he is esteemed as a great and liberal man. He has given much of his wealth to charities, but each contribution advertised his house and brought him large returns. It is said that some of his clerks who enlisted at the beginning of the war on the understanding that their places would be kept open for them, found those places filled when they returned. The number of his employees is not less than two thousand, and many of these are girls.

The rules with which each person employed by him has to comply are as rigorous and unyielding as the Medean laws of old. One is to get the largest amount of labor for the smallest amount of money. He pays the smallest salaries of any large dry goods dealer in New York, and the girls employed by him complain that the place is the hardest they ever had. He keeps to the strict letter of his word with every man, and neither asks nor gives favors. Creditors looking to him for grace speedily find its opposite. He has about a score of partners, and all must take the law from him. And, in conclusion, he is married but childless, and the magnificent mansion he is building on Fifth Avenue is to be bequeathed to the city of New York, together with the costly collection of art it will contain. This is the real A. T. Stewart, as he is known by those who have met him daily for many months. He is one of the architects of New York's commercial greatness, and his disappearance from this world will be a public loss, and cannot say that he will be greatly mourned in private.

Another renowned millionaire is CORNELIUS VANDERBILT, long famous in railroad and steamship enterprises, and now a very Emperor in Wall Street. Vanderbilt, like Stewart, is well up to the patriarchal "three score and ten." He is tall and thin, and as plain looking a man as you would find in all the haunts of the bulls and bears. Of all the self-made men in New York he is the most prominent. About forty years ago he commenced his own account by sailing a small boat between New York and Staten Island, and carrying freight and passengers to and fro; but it was not until the California fever broke out that the road to great wealth was opened to him. Vanderbilt always had an eye to good openings, and he was quick to avail himself of the chances to which fortune threw him, that were offered by the rush to California. Before that time he had acquired experience and considerable capital in the steamboat trade on the Hudson, and both were immediately turned into the new channel. A steamship line was started, and passengers and freight rushed upon him, his capital doubled and trebled, and quadrupled, other lines were started, and when the late war broke out Vanderbilt's steamships were ploughing every sea.

About three years ago he retired from commerce to devote himself wholly to the Hudson River Railroad, with which he had been for several years connected. He brought the same spirit to this that had made him successful in the other. To break down and utterly crush all opposition was always his purpose, and by executing it to the letter he has made a name that is world renowned, and a fortune supposed to be at least ten millions. Commodore Vanderbilt is a man of hard common sense, little education, and a great fancy for fast horses. His charities are unrecorded, and might, probably, be disposed of in the same way that a historian is said to have disposed of the subject of snakes in Ireland—"There are no snakes in Ireland." I have been told that when a committee called on him last year and solicited a subscription for the South, saying the people were starving, he simply answered, "D—n them, let them starve; they deserve it." He has a partiality for strong words, and always speaks very plainly.

DANIEL DREW. is another rich New Yorker, well-known in the United States, though not of such world-wide reputation as either Stewart or Vanderbilt. Like the latter, he made the principal part of his fortune in the steamship business. He is a native of Putnam county, where he now owns one of the largest farms in New York. He began his money-making career as a cattle dealer, and he still sticks to that business, though others manage it for him. Before railroads were built he used to bring droves of cattle from the West, and it often took three months to make the journey. He was the founder of the famous "Bull's Head" in this city, a place that has been for thirty years the great cattle market of New York. Drew is also a heavy operator in Wall Street. In fact, next to Vanderbilt, he is the strongest man there, and can do pretty much as he pleases with any stock he takes hold of.

He was for a long time the leading spirit of the Harlem railroad, and it was his capital and energy that kept the road from going to smash long ago. He is now understood to be grand director of all the operations in Erie, and the panic he sometimes gets up in that show how tremendous power he wields. Drew differs from Stewart and Vanderbilt in being public spirited, while they are somewhat selfish. He has established a Methodist theological seminary in New Jersey, at an expense of $250,000, and he means to give it an endowment of $300,000. He is worth between six and seven millions, and is still a strong, hearty man, though he must be as old as Vanderbilt. He and the other two were bitter rivals once time; but that is all past, and they are now as good friends as any two men like them can be.

Without making a useless harangue, I will say to my friends and the public that I am now prepared to supply all of their wants in the way of STOVES. I therefore invite my country friends to call and examine my stock of COOKING and HEATING STOVES before purchasing elsewhere, confident that they will not go away displeased. I would also enumerate amongst my stock a fine lot of TIN WARE, of my own manufacture, and made by very experienced workmen; also, TINNED SAFES, PRESERVING KETTLES, Fruit Cans, Fine Japaned and Plated Ware, and Chamber Sets, to which I would call the attention of the public. This popular and long established Hotel, under its new management, is now open for the reception of guests; and travellers, who may select it as a temporary resting place, or those choosing it as a permanent home, will have no cause to regret their choice.
The rooms are well furnished, and are kept neat and clean; the waiters are polite and attentive, and the table is supplied with all the delicacies the market affords. The Wines and Liquors kept in the bar room are of the most superior grade. Coaches are always in readiness to carry the guests of the house to and from the railroad depots, steamboat wharves, or any part of the city. nov 5
