RENDERING WOOD FIREPROOF.—We can scarcely expect that the building of wooden houses will hereafter in all cases be forbidden by law, and no fireproof material has as yet been discovered which can take the place of the wood which now enters into the construction of both brick and stone houses. Iron beams and columns have proved entirely inadequate to withstand an intense heat. They are, under such circumstances, but little, if at all, better than wooden ones. They will, in fact, curl up to such an extent that, in Chicago, buildings, it is said, fall down owing to the heat from neighboring fires. We can, however, with but little trouble and expense, render wood almost as passive with regard to fire as brick or stone; and we think that this precaution should be insisted on by municipal authorities.

The process to which we allude, and on which there exists no patent, so that any one who likes can try it, is briefly as follows: The dried lumber is soaked for a short time in a solution of soluble glass, a silicate of soda or potash, and then immersed in a bath of lime water. In this way the silicate of soda is decomposed and a silicate of lime formed in the pores of the wood.

This substance occurs in nature as a mineral known as Wollastonite, and is both fireproof and insoluble in water, so that wood once treated in this way will never change its qualities. Soluble glass is largely manufactured in this country, and is used for a variety of purposes. Engineering and Mining Journal.
