EXTRAORDINARY MURDER TRIAL.

The Frankfort Journal brings a very full report of the conclusion of an extraordinary murder trial in Germany, in which the people of central New York will feel a lively degree of interest, as it is the sequel to a horrible tragedy which transpired in Cayuga county, N. Y., last year. Condensing the story of the preliminary events in this remarkable case, and its strange—and, as many here will believe, inadequate—result, the following facts are presented:

In 1871, Mr. Westcott, a farmer living near the town of Locke, Cayuga county, New York, took from the House of Refuge at Buffalo, for the purpose of rearing her, a young Irish girl named Etta Conking. She was a servant in the family when he hired a young German farmer-laborer named Jos. Egler, in April, 1873. On the morning of May 3, 1873, Mr. Westcott and his wife left home, going several miles distant to spend the day, and leaving at home the young Irish girl and the German laborer. That afternoon Jane Westcott, a relative of the family, visited the house and found Etta Conking dead, lying in a pool of gore in the hall-way, with the blade of a huge butcher-knife buried in her breast. She called in neighbors, and suspicion at once fell upon the German laborer. She was not to be found at the time, but was captured the next day in the town of Dryden, twenty miles distant from the scene of the commission of his horrible crime. December 4, 1873, he was brought to trial at Auburn. Public opinion was very strong against him, the murder seemed to have been a wanton and extraordinarily brutal one. On the 6th of December, he was found guilty and sentenced to be hanged. Thirteen days later the counsel for the prisoner obtained a stay of proceedings, and before the Supreme Court, at Syracuse, moved for a new trial, which was denied. The case was next brought before the Court of Appeals, at Albany, and that tribunal, on March 28, 1874, reaffirmed the decision of the lower Court, and fixed the date for Egler's execution on June 5, 1874.

Meanwhile, the news of these proceedings reached Egler's family in Germany, and through the influence which they were enabled to bring to bear upon the Baden Minister of Justice and Foreign Affairs, the Imperial Ambassador at Washington, and the Imperial Consul-General in New York, were instructed to intercede for the condemned man. A petition for his pardon was by them addressed to Governor Dix, who so far exercised his executive clemency as to place Egler at the disposal of the Imperial German Ambassador, on condition that he should be sent for trial and punishment to the courts of Baden. On May 16 Egler was sent, under safe escort, to Baden, and his trial there at the General Assizes has just been concluded.

Upon his trial he asked the privilege, which was accorded him, of making a statement to the Court, and then detailed the circumstances of the commission of his crime; a confession which his counsel, when he was tried in this country would not permit him to make. His story was in substance as follows:

On the fatal 3d of May, 1873, at about ten o'clock in the forenoon, he went in from the field, where he had been spreading manure, to the house, to obtain a lunch, which Mrs. Westcott had been in the habit of giving him after his four hours of hard morning work. In the pantry he encountered Etta Conking, and asked her for something to eat. She refused to give him anything, saying she had nothing for him, and, without taking any notice of his hungry condition, went on about her work, going out to the well for a pail of water, and returning with it to the kitchen. He reiterated his request for something to eat, and received a second refusal, whereupon he vowed that he would not go out to the field again without his lunch. Etta seized a poker lying upon the hearth, saying she would put him out if he did not go out of his own accord, as she wanted him to take his dirty boots out of her kitchen. He persisted in his refusal to go, and warned her not to strike him with the poker. She replied that she was not afraid of him, and dealt him a violent blow upon the shoulder. He snatched the poker from her and threw it down upon the hearth; whereupon she seized him by the hair, and tried to drag him from the kitchen.

A desperate struggle ensued between them, each tearing at the other's hair and both exchanging savage blows with their fists. During this conflict they got near the door of the tool-chamber, close to which, upon a bench, lay three large knives. Etta, perceiving the knives, endeavored to seize one of them. He, in striving to prevent her from doing so, pushed her back, and in so doing upset the bench, throwing the knives upon the floor. A violent contest now ensued for the possession of one of the deadly weapons. Egler finally succeeded in clutching a knife. At this moment he received a blow from Etta's clenched hand upon his nose, which set that organ bleeding and infuriated him. In his rage he struck the girl with the knife. She stopped, as he supposed, to pick up another knife, and, in the unconscious fury and desperation of the moment, he again and again plunged his knife into her body, not seeing where he struck, not thinking whether he was murdering her or not. As one mad thrust plunged the blade up to its hilt in her breast she sunk to the floor gasping, "I'm dead!"

In an instant the horror of the deed which he had done overpowered him. He sunk upon his knees, calling her by name, trying to raise her, looking vainly for some sign of life. She was beyond hope, dead, mangled hideously, a gory corpse. In his despair he rushed up stairs, intending to kill himself, first dragging her body a little aside from the door, but not wanting to endeavor to hide it. When upon the verge of self-destruction his love of life overcame his resolution, and he deterred upon an effort to escape. Then he rushed down stairs again, and fled from the house by another door than that near which she lay. He could not pass the horrified sight of the accusing corpse, and driven by a horror even greater of the dead than of the living who might pursue him, fled on and on until he was captured.

The Court, and even the prosecuting attorney, deemed his story plausible, and considered that there were mitigating circumstances to be taken into consideration in awarding the penalty of his crime. As he was a minor, his punishment was fixed at two and a half years' imprisonment. Had he been of age, doubtless the term of confinement would have been given him.

In all its aspects this is one of the most remarkable cases upon the record of modern criminal jurisprudence.
