A RURAL GHOST STORY.

A correspondent writes from Lancaster, O.: Sugar Grove, a quiet, lazy, old fashioned little village, situated about eight miles south of Lancaster, on the banks of the legendary Hockhocking, has a sensation.

For the past fifty years the good denizens of this prosaic and diminutive borough have had most unqualified faith in the visitations of a representative of the sweet by-and-by, and many of them have been frightened out of their seven senses by actual encounters with this supernatural gentleman, and have supplied us with accurate and detailed descriptions of the apparition.

The facts of the case are these: Years ago, over half a century, when the pleasant little village of Sugar Grove comprised but a log cabin or two, one dark, stormy night, when the wind was howling through the hoarse wilderness, and the sky was full of ominous clouds, a jewelry peddler stopped at the cabin of a settler by the name of Pierre Bordeau, a little, weathered old man of Gallic extraction, whose miserable domicile stood on what is now the farm of R. L. Sharpe, esq., just where the family burial ground is situated. This nomadic purveyor solicited a night's lodging for himself and horse, and, as was customary in those good old days, was unhesitatingly and heartily accommodated. In the morning the peddler of cheap jewels turned up missing, which, however, occasioned no very great alarm, as it was supposed that he had left in the night to avoid the little compensation old Pierre might properly expect for his hospitality.

The peddler's disappearance had already been forgotten, when, late in the afternoon, a neighboring farm-hand found his horse, with its throat cut, lodged against a flood-gate across a curvature in the Hockhocking, when the startling intelligence was scattered abroad, and diligent search was instantly instituted for the missing traveler, but to no avail. Not the slightest trace but a pool of blood, back of the Frenchman's cabin, near the base of a hill, which bubbles forth a spring of cold water, could be found. Years flew round, and the story of the miser peddler and the dark pool of blood became a tradition, but was never after thought to be haunted, and the hunters who stopped in their wanderings to slake their thirst at old Bordeau's spring, gave it the name of "ugly water," on account of the peculiar odor that arose from it and its bitter taste, which name it bears to this day.

Many a night, when the sky was hidden by the clouds, and the wind sighed and moaned lugubriously around the hill, has the passing countryman seen the ghost of the missing peddler, which would flit along in front of the horses until the spring was reached, when it would vanish, apparently into the bowels of the hill.

That the old jewelry peddler had been murdered and robbed by one had the least doubt, and that his troubled spirit had taken this mode to scare the murderer into a confession and repentance they also firmly believed. Strages to say—no, there is nothing strange about it either—for old Bordeau was a kind-hearted, inoffensive farmer; and he was never supposed as having committed the horrible crime, or being accessory thereto, until the day of his death when he confessed the deed, but would not divulge the spot where the body had been concealed.

However, almost his last words were: "Under the house," and on searching there the peddler's clothes and pack of jewels were found, decayed and corroded by time, but no evidence of the body or bones. Through investigation was made, the whole but demolished and torn away and the foundations upheaved, but no signs of the object for which they worked were ever brought to light.

The confession and demise of the wicked little Frenchman, however, did not soothe the ruffled spirit of the victim of his treachery, and off and on the tall, white, weird and frightful figure would make its appearance before the startled vision of some passing farmer, and the spot was finally given up as hopelessly the ghost's, and a detour of two miles may be a courageous man had made to avoid the place from the sun had withdrawn its benign rays from over the earth.

Much speculation has been indulged in as to what disposition the old Frenchman made of the traveler, but no definite or satisfactory conclusion could be arrived at until within a few days since, after a lapse of nearly seventy years, the whole tragedy was made plain. Mr. Robert Sharp, in building his new residence concluded to convey water for common use from the spring at the hill's base, around which had hung a dark mystery, to his house by means of subterranean pipes.

To accomplish this the spring had to be greatly enlarged, and while at work here in digging out "ugly water," the skeleton of a man in perfect preservation was exhumed from beneath the rocks, which corresponded exactly in stature with the missing and murdered peddler. No one who knows the facts of the case has any doubts whatever but that the murdered peddler had been buried in the spring and carefully covered with rocks by the cunning Frenchman, and now that his bones have been given a Christian burial, it is hoped that he will lie quiet and doleful until the great day, when all alike, the quick and the dead, shall rise and be judged.

It is reported that Adna Culver, of Pennsylvania, who went out to the Fiji Islands last summer as a missionary, is at home again. Her biggest Sunday school class shuffled into her house one morning with nothing on but necklaces, whereupon Anna's enthusiasm in the cause melted away.

As a general rule, it is better to take little notice of foolish, or even of malignant gossip, let it alone. By and by those who go around retailing such stuff will grow weary if not ashamed, perhaps they will feel a disgust at their own baseness. If they are not noticed they will sink out of sight.

At the funeral of a girl in Danville, N.Y., the other day, the pall bearers were six young ladies dressed in deep mourning.
