A Shocking Story Retold.

It was beneath a bright summer sun that Mary E. Sarratt was murdered. The press of the United States was amply represented. A majority of it applauded the cowardly crime. When the improvised trap fell, and swung back, and left her body dangling lifeless on the fatal rope, there were present generals and officers of the nation bearing its uniform, whose buttons and shoulder straps glittered in the bright rays. Save good Father Walter, no voice uttered "God bless her!" as she fell. The soldiers that paced the top of the surrounding walls made no sign. Several turned away their heads, sickened by the sight, and a few to see a dead dove in the nineteenth century that in the fourteenth would have been delegated to the secretaries of a dungeon or the knive of a solitary bravo.

Women have been murdered before—jealousy, drunkenness, despair, a maddened cupidity have all in turn murdered women. Never before was a hero called in the bright and open day to see such a deed done. Hancock was. He obeyed the call, and saw that the hanged were protected, that the assassination was not interrupted. How his spirit rebelled at the task was written on his broad face. The writer saw it there as in a book.

It was in the old Arsenal penitentiary yard, in Washington, in the year that they strangled this woman. The Arsenal and penitentiary face and terminate at Four and a half street, which stretches to them from the City Hall. There have erected there since then a statue of Lincoln. Were it the man himself he might see the site of the murder committed in his name from the pearly pedestal on which it is raised. The outer gate of the Arsenal faces that statue at the other end of the long, wide street exactly. From the gate to the old penitentiary, where the mockery of the trial was played, runs a broad and gravelled path. This path turned around the penitentiary walls, and led to the gate of the yard where stood the scaffold. The walls of the penitentiary formed two sides of the yard, and the other two were walls built to enclose the yard, and these stood some fifteen feet high. Upon these walls sentries were placed.

Fronting the wall that ran at right angles with the end of the penitentiary, stood a strange, weird-looking structure. The one end of it had a ladder that reached to the ground, beyond that end, some twenty yards, was a small iron door that opened into the penitentiary—in one of those lower tier of cells beneath a raised and replaced flag, were rotting the remains of John Wilkes Booth. This wooden structure was the scaffold. It consisted of a platform, resting on square wooden posts. The front part of the platform was attached to the back part by hinges, and this front rested on posts, which its weight held in place. Along the back and solid part of the platform were four chairs.

Around this yard lounged the correspondents, were ranged some soldiers, and right in the middle of the yard, when the water entered it, stood the tall and ample form of Hancock in full uniform.

"General, may I go in once more and see the prisoners?"

"Yes, sir."

"Mount your horse, go to the outer gate of the Arsenal. Don't dismount, but keep your eye along Four and a half street. Should you see a mounted soldier riding this way, drop your horse and tell me. Stay there till you are relieved by the sight of that soldier, or by order."

"Yes, sir."

The orderly sped away.

"No, sir, I cannot permit it. They are with ministers and priests; have but a few minutes to live. I have refused every other correspondent."

"Do you expect a reprieve, General?"

"I expect nothing. That woman, however, shall not lose a chance of life, if I can help it. That's why I sent that orderly to the gate."

expected breeze off his head, as if to make way for the white cap. Detective Roberts, his hangerman, was about pulling it over his face. I turned to see her. She had lost the power to stand. They had to hold her up when they pulled down the cap. Great God! can a thought be more horrible!

Still no one at the gate!

They were told to walk forward upon the front and treacherous part of the platform. There they stood, Atzrot swaying with fear; Payne crept and firm as the gladiator, who he resembled, when awaiting the fatal fall; Harold, still, like lifeless to all appearance. The sentries had ceased pacing. You could hear a pin drop.

"Good-bye, my friends, we'll meet again," exclaimed Harold.

Atzrot said something I could not hear. Still no one at the gate!

Hancock closed his watch.

The men who upheld the lifeless woman stepped back on the solid half of the platform. She was falling, when suddenly the supporting posts in front were knocked down, and all four dangled and swung—the most ghastly spectacle man ever saw!

She never perceptibly moved. Her petitions and cries had been gathered with a string about her neck. She hung a dead weight of flesh, not less than two hundred pounds.

Payne writhed and twisted for several minutes.

There was no shout. There was a shudder went through all present—through soldier and civilian—nothing more.

Again I looked at Hancock. If ever he wore that frightened look on the field, his soldier fame is a lie.

Who withheld the reprieve?

He! says Andrew Johnson did. Johnson said he never asked for it. Holt aims that an official application by the murderous convalescence of troopers, called the court, was made to Andy for a reprieve. Andy said Stanton withheld it. Each threw the blame on the other; but, whosever was to blame, the deed was done, in face of day, under the shadow of the flag of the United States, by the authority of its President, the acquiescence of its Cabinet, the signing of the Secretary of War, and under the actual supervision of a major general of its armies.

Of all the more active participants in that murder, Holt alone remains to face the strange task that have overtaken his associates there—in dubious and sudden death.

Stanton died quickly after. He died suddenly, and suspected of the suicide of remorse.

King drowned himself. And men do say he drowned himself from inability to face the constant memory of his unsoldiered share in that woman's murder.

Andrew Johnson, whose demise recalls the whole of that awful story to the mind again, died suddenly. But not, we trust, because of this crime, of which a passing weakness allowed him a passive accomplice.—Richmond Enquirer's Correspondence.
