THURSDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 4.

Riding a Mule.

I have spoken of Judge Farr. His acco- tors owned the land near Dutch Gap, and his wife was a Miss Bullock, of Lynchburg. Nearly every summer I meet out here in more or less related to Virginia. The judge as I have mentioned, is charming company. Among the good things he told us was a story of a friend of his who attempted one night to drive a stray mule out of his yard. Arrayed in that elegant garment which boys abhor and men delight in, he arose from his bed, descended to the yard, opened wide the front gate, and began to "shoo" the mule, his wife locking on from the chamber window. Mr. Mule declined to be "shooed." His wife began to laugh. Next day the mule's matches and his wife's laughter, the good man crept softly up to the animal, and, with a sudden leap, mounted on him, expecting to ride him promptly out of the yard. But the astonished mule took off around the house, the night shirt flapping and cracking in the cold air. The faster the mule went the louder the shirt cracked, and the louder it cracked the faster he went. Around and around and around they went, the shirt flapping and cracking and splitting, the man clinging for dear life with his legs and valiantly trying to hold him back by the mane—his wife screaming with laughter and pestering him with questions like these: "Light my dear, light and spend the evening—now do."

"Oh he went. Here he comes again. "How would you like a cup of tea?" "I would the horse he went like lightning—then he have in sight again. "Maybe you would like a book to read; here is Baxter's Saint's Rest for you." He was gone again, but the next moment he was back. "Think you could open a bottle of porter with your teeth if I would throw it to you?" "He vanished like a meteor. "Got a cold goose in the sideboard; couldn't you carve it with one hand and hold on with the other?" "Mary, cried out the exasperated man, "you are the most infernal, meddling fool on earth, and if you don't come down and stop this accursed mule I'll be dead in five minutes. I'm raw as a beetsteak now." She might as well have tried to stop a whirlwind, for by this time the shirt was split up to the neck in ribbons about three inches wide, and the mule, going at the rate of a tornado, finally the mule faint, and the man fell to one side, helpless as a little child and sore all over as a boil. His wife with difficulty tugged him into the house, where he lay for weeks. A circle of rice resembling a small milky way described the rice course around the house. At intervals during the remainder of his natural life the mule was subject to fits of vertigo, and could neither be ridden nor driven until they put goggles of darkened glass upon him; for the sight of anything white threw him into convulsions and set him madly racing again. —G. W. Bayles.
