Emperor William's Deformity.

In Paris a few days ago I looked about Emperor William with a friend who is a medical man, and obtained for your readers most interesting and definite information as to the young ruler's physical condition. The information may be relied upon as exact beyond any question.

"Young William was unlucky in the first place," said my friend, in having a princess for a mother, and equally so in having been born a prince. Those two circumstances account for his unhappy deformity. The usually accepted accounts of its nature and origin are imaginative rubbish. The Crown Princess Frederick was, as is generally known, traveling in an out-of-way place at a very indiscreet period. The birth of the present German emperor was unexpected, and he was helped into the world by some obscure little doctor with an awe for royalty far in excess of his knowledge of surgery. If he had been allowed to think that his patient was simply an ordinary woman of strong physique all would probably have been well, but the fact was carefully impressed upon him that he had in his hands the life of a future queen, and the child would, perhaps, be heir to the Prussian throne. This so demoralized the little doctor that he added the strength of his own muscles to the forces of nature and so severed all the muscles of the infant's left arm. When I was called to Windsor by Queen Victoria to attend the little boy I saw at once that his case was hopeless. If he had been a grocer's son, some good doctor would have been called in, and some sound method of cure adopted and followed. As a prince, however, he had to be seen by every great doctor, no system was followed out, and the worst possible result of the accident ensued, namely, complete atrophy of the arm.

"It is wasted completely away, and is probably smaller than when I examined him as a boy at Windsor. Fortunately, such wonderful skill has been shown by the German surgeons as to save him from the mortification of having it plainly seen that one of his arms is simply the withered arm of a child. The withered limb is padded out in a most lifelike fashion, and not only that, but within the padding is a most wonderfully clever machine—a series of strings and cords acting like the muscles of the arm. These artificial muscles are connected with the good muscles of the shoulder most adroitly, so that while in a natural condition he would be incapable of moving his withered arm, this most ingenious mechanism enables him to impart to it movements that are almost lifelike. He can raise or lower his artificial hand and use it sufficiently well to guide carefully trained and broken chargers which are selected for him.

"The Emperor's deformity," said he, "is nothing except as it mortifies and irritates an extremely proud and sensitive man; but the disease in his head is one which may have most serious consequences for all Europe. It may drive the Emperor to the most extravagant acts, or suddenly, by killing him, end the speculation as to what his career may be. I can tell you positively that it already makes him insane at intervals. He was insane when he delivered certain speeches which his advisers were compelled to revise and interpret officially. He was mentally deranged by his suffering and the direct effect of his malady upon the brain. All the skill of the doctors about him is concentrated to fight the disease that is growing in his head. Once already it has gone beyond the control of the doctors, and the Emperor suffered a most dreadful attack, all knowledge of which was carefully kept from the public. When the disease reaches a certain point there will come an explosion, and the Emperor will either die or become hopelessly insane.

"Just what the disease is I will not say. Its nature may be described as that of a tumor and an abnormal growth within the brain. The skill of his physicians may fight off the final stages of the disease for a longer period than at present seems probable, but there is very little hope that they will be able to cure it. The young Emperor is a decidedly unlucky man. Old Emperor William suffered, which is not generally known, from a form of epilepsy, and his grandson, who has inherited the trouble, is also afflicted with fits epileptic in character.—N. Y. Sun.
