MEDICINAL.

It Makes You Hungry

Spring medicine means more now-a-days than it did ten years ago. The winter of 1888-9 has left the nerves all jangled out. The nerves must be strengthened, the blood purified, liver and bowels regulated. Paine's Celery Compound—the Spring medicine of today—does all this, as nothing else can. Prescribed by Physicians, Recommended by Druggists, Endorsed by Ministers, Guaranteed by the Manufacturers to be

Paine's Celery Compound

The Best Spring Medicine.
"In the spring of 1887 I was all run down. I would get up in the morning with so tired a feeling that I could hardly get out of bed. I bought a bottle of Paine's Celery Compound, and before I had taken it a week I felt very much better. I can cheerfully recommend it to all who have a building up and strengthening medicine." Real Facts About the Death of Crown Prince Rudolf and His Barones.

The late Crown Prince's nervous system, which was never strong, had been impaired by a long series of appalling dissipation, gross profligacy, and excesses of all kinds. A startling number of families of all ranks connected with the imperial court tell of the shame which the Crown Prince brought upon them. At his debauches he used to drink tumblers partly filled with champagne and partly with brandy. Such courses, in addition to reducing him to a state of mental and physical wretchedness, brought about quarrels of a very bitter nature with his wife and his father. The Crown Princess Stephanie is a handsome woman of uncertain temper. She was not the kind to overlook her husband's excesses and there were violent scenes between the pair. Eventually they decided to live apart, although they always went about together in public. Those who knew the true inwardness of things were amazed at the play acting which Rudolf and his wife kept up before the world.

About six months ago the Crown Prince became violently enamored of Baronesse Marie Vetsera. The family is well known generally among the smart people of the European capitals. The Baronesse was a remarkably beautiful girl. She was tall, with long black hair, large dark eyes, and irregular but charming features. Rudolf's love was of a more enduring and worthy kind than in other cases. He loathed the artificial yoke which bound him to his wife, and at an uncertain date he sent a formal petition, drafted by an ecclesiastical dignitary, to the Pope applying for a divorce. The petition was referred to the Emperor of Austria, who indignantly remonstrated with his son. Things were in this state a week before the Crown Prince's death.

The Baronesse, on her part, was encountering equally great opposition in her own family; the latter were determined that she should marry a Parisian financier, but she was already deeply in love with the heir to the throne. The angry threats of the imperial father and of the Vetsera family brought the pair to desperation. Tired of the world and hopeless of obtaining the happiness which they desired, they resolved to die. The lovers went off to the isolated Castle Meyerling, accompanied only by Count Joseph Hoyes, who considered it an honor to assist two such lovers to meet each other. In Vienna, however, the imperial family heard with consternation of the rendezvous, and Prince Philip, of Coburg, the Crown Prince's brother-in-law, was sent to bring Rudolf back; but Prince Philip met with such a curt reception that he went back alone. That night the Prince, the Baronesse, and Count Hoyes had dinner together, and were made merry during the remainder of the evening by one Craterish, an outcast cabman of Vienna, who sang comic songs in a room adjoining that occupied by the Prince and his guests. The spectacle of the heir to one of the great empires of Europe sitting with a girl he had wronged, both of them resolved on death, and both listening to the ribald songs of a drunken cabman before going to their doom is dramatic in the extreme. A debauch followed. It was the last wild freak of utter desperation and self-abandonment. On Wednesday morning the Prince's valet went early to his master's room to inform him that Prince Philip of Coburg had again come from Vienna. The door was locked. All those in the house gathered and broke it open. On the bed they saw the Crown Prince and Marie Vetsera dead. The girl had taken strychnine, a packet which had contained that poison being found near by. The Prince's left arm clasped Marie's body. The revolver with which he had shot himself through the brain lay in his right hand. It is not surprising that the horrible death of Crown Prince Rudolf should have had serious consequences on the health of his mother, who has for a long time been ill. The Empress is now suffering from severe mental trouble in addition to her constitutional complaint of rheumatism. How ill she is shown by the fact that for three weeks the Emperor never left her at all, even for exercise. The two have been notoriously in a permanent state of quarrelling, induced probably by his Majesty's excessive gaiety, but illness has drawn them together again. The Empress will probably go to Wiesbaden for massage treatment before long. A villa has been prepared there for her. The imperial pair are now staying at the castle at Buda. —Letter in N. Y. Sun.
