MUSIC FOR THE POOR. An Experiment That Has Met With Success in British Cities.

Court and alley concerts for the benefit of the people of the worst sections of some of the large English cities have proved so popular and successful that they now appear to be looked upon as an established feature of social work.

Three years ago the idea of bringing good music to the very doors of those who could in no other way hope to get it was put into practice by the Liverpool Food and Betterment association.

The experiment was looked upon with indifference by many at first, but it was soon found that the common people of the most overcrowded districts were capable of a degree of appreciation for good music sufficient to preserve order and secure admirable attention for the artists.

Manchester, Birmingham and other cities of the north and midlands adopted the idea with equally good results.

Last summer no less than 90 of these back street concerts were given in Liverpool alone, the total attendance being more than 88,000, while more than 500 artists rendered gratuitous service.

Hundreds of men and women who drop on the doorsteps at night, wearied with the day of toil, find a pleasure in these concerts comparable to nothing else in their narrow lives.

The value of these concerts lies not solely in the pleasure which they give; however, for there is a moral effect which perhaps lasts long after the concert songs have been forgotten.

Without a hint from any one, it was found that an hour or two before a concert was to begin the people would try to tidy up the selected court or alley, sweeping the street and making what simple attempts at decoration were possible with red paper, pipe clay and ornamented paper.
