The Taming of Red Butte Western...

By FRANCIS LYNDE
Copyright, 1910.
By Charles Scribner's Sons

"I reckon we are needing a roundup over here on this jerkwater mighty bad, Mr. Lidgerwood," he said, half humorously. "But, Lord love you, that's the old 210 chasin' us with the passenger, and she can't catch Bat Williams and the '66 in a month of Sundays if we didn't have that dog-gone spavined leg under the tender. She sure couldn't."

Lidgerwood smiled in spite of his annoyance. "But it isn't railroadin'," he insisted, meeting his first pupil half way and as man to man. "You might do this thing ninety-nine times—"

The sentence was never finished. The special, lagging a little now in deference to the smoking hot box, was rounding one of the long hill curves to the left. Suddenly the air brakes ground sharply upon the wheels, shrill whistlings from the 266 sounded the stop signal, and past the end of the slowing service car a trackman ran frantically up the line toward the following passenger, yelling and swinging his striped coat like a madman.

Lidgerwood caught a fleeting glimpse of a section gang's green "slow" flag lying toppled over between the rails 100 feet to the rear. He called to Bradford to jump and then ran forward to drag the Japanese cook out of his galley.

It was all over in a moment. There was time enough for Lidgerwood to rush the little Tadasu to the forward vestibule, to fling him into space and to make his own flying leap for safety before the crisis came. Happily there was no wreck, though the margin of escape was the narrowest. Williams stuck to his post in the cab of the 266, applying and releasing the brakes and running as far ahead as he dared upon the loosened timbers of the culvert, for which the section gang's slow flag was out. Carter, the engineer on the passenger train, jumped, but his fireman was of better mettle and stayed with the machine up to the moment when the shuddering mass of iron and steel thrust its pilot under the trucks of Lidgerwood's car.

It was an excellent opportunity for eloquence of the explosive sort, and when the dust had settled the track and trainmen were evidently expecting the well deserved tongue lashing. But in crises like this the self superintending was at his best contained best. Instead of swearing at the men, he gave his orders quietly and with the brisk certainty of one who knows his trade. The passenger train was to keep ten minutes behind its own time until the next siding was passed, making up beyond that point if its running orders permitted. The special was to proceed on 201's time to the siding in question, at which point it would slide-track and let the passenger precede it.

Bradford was in the cab of 266 when Williams eased his engine and the service car over the unsafe culvert and lunched the throttle open for dead moral certainty. When he saw what was due to happen back yonder at the culvert he told me '23, all right, but he took time to hike up ahead and yank that Jap cook out o' the car kitchen before he turned his own little hand spring into the ditch."

"That kind of sand is all right in God's country, Andy, but out here you got to know how to fight with pitchforks and such other tools as come handy. The new boss may be that kind of a scrapper, but he sure don't look it."

"No," agreed Bradford, ruminating thoughtfully.

Williams, brawny and broad chested, leaned against his box.

"He'd better have nerve or get some," he commented. "Tother ways it's him for an early wooden overcoat and a trip back home in the express car."

The special was now on the siding. Back in the service car Lidgerwood was sitting quietly in the doorway smoking his delayed after breakfast cigar and timing the upcoming passenger train, watch in hand. Carter was ten minutes, to the exact second, behind his schedule time when the train thundered past on the main track, and Lidgerwood pocketed his watch with a smile of satisfaction. It was the first small victory in the campaign for reform.

Later, however, when the special was once more in motion westward, the desert laid hold upon him with the grip which first benumbs, then breeds dull rage and finally makes men mad.

There were no signs of life, no cattle upon the distant hills, no loungers on the station platforms. Lidgerwood had crossed this arid, lifeless plain twice within the week on his preliminary tour of inspection, but both times he had been in the Pullman, with fellow passengers to fill the near field of vision and to temper the awful loneliness of the waste. Now, however, the desert with its heat, its stillness, its vacancy, its pitiless barrenness, claimed him as its own. He wondered that he had been impatient with the men it bred.

It was past noon when the shrill whistle of the locomotive signaled the approach to the division headquarters, and he was thankful that the builders of Angels had pitched their tents and driven their stakes in the desert's edge rather than in its heart.

Truly, Angels was not much to be thankful for, as the exile from the east regretfully admitted when he looked out upon it from the windows of his office in the second story of the Crow's Nest. A many tracked railroad yard flanked on one side by the repair shops, roundhouse and coal chutes and on the other by a straggling town of bare and commonplace exteriors, unpainted, unfenced, treeless and windswept, Angels stood baldly for what it was—a mere stopping place in transit for the Red Butte Western.

The new superintendent turned his back upon the depressing outlook and laid his hand upon the latch of the door opening into the adjoining room. There was a thing to be said about the reckless bunching of trains, out of reach of the wires, and it might as well be said now as later, he determined. But at the moment of door opening he was made to realize that a tall, boxlike contrivance in one corner of the room was a desk and that it was uninhabited.

The man who rose up to greet him was bearded, heavy shouldered and hollow eyed, and he was past middle age. Green cardboard cones protecting his shirt sleeves and a shade of the same material visoring the sunken eyes were the only clerical suggestions about him.

"You are Mr. Hallock?" Lidgerwood made the guess without offering to shake hands, the high, boxlike desk forbidding the attempt.

"Yes," The answer was neither antagonistic nor placatory; it was merely colorless.

"My name is Lidgerwood. You have heard of my appointment?"

"Again the colorless 'Yes'."

"Mr. Ford spoke to me about you last night. He told me that you had been Mr. Chamberley's chief clerk and that since Chamberley's resignation you have been acting as his secretary."

and two years and more." "I understand," said Lidgerwood and then he spoke of the careless dispatching.

"That will be Callahan the day man," McCloskey broke in wrathfully. "But that's the way of it. When we get through the twenty-four hours without killing somebody or smashing something I thank God and put a red mark on that calendar over my desk."

"Well, we won't go back of the returns," declared Lidgerwood.
