A big time is anticipated this evening in Council on the redistricting ordinance. One argument will be urged strongly against them, and that is the discovery that redistricting will legislate the School Board out of existence, as there is nothing in the existing statute contemplating redistricting which will put nine new members in the Board according to the law of alteration, which would make only fourteen with the five still in the Board whose terms do not expire, whereas the law says there must be two for each ward; and supposing the nine ward ordinance to be the one adopted, this would lack four of the number required by law.

The fall of a ballet dancer on the stage of a theatre is described as follows in the Boston Herald: "She came capering down, pointing one foot to 6 o'clock and the other to high noon, when a sudden both feet flew up at once, and she sat down with what the reporter of a hanging would call a 'dull thud.' There was the customary idiotic smile on her face when the mishap occurred, and it remained there for a few seconds through force of habit; but gradually it was displaced by an expression of deep, deep disgust, and her lips moved while the people wondered what she was saying."

Among the Virginia Girls

(Washington Letter in Chicago Times.)

A young society swell who was invited not long ago to go down and visit a family in the interior of Virginia gives a very interesting picture of the pleasant customs that are still in vogue in that State. When one gets away from railroads and towns, he finds things in about the same condition that they were about one hundred years ago. There are men in some of the back counties of Virginia who never yet heard of Jackson's death, and who would be very much startled if the news was sprung upon them suddenly.

This young society man was a great horseman. He took his horse with him, a high-spirited, dark chestnut gelding. He found upon his arrival that his ability to ride at once made him popular with everybody. He was surprised to find that almost everybody rode horseback. Wagons and carriages were almost unknown. Young gentlemen going out to give their sweethearts a treat, simply swung a blanket on their horses, behind their saddle, where the young lady rides pillion fashion. He says it was not an uncommon sight to see four persons on one horse.

He proves this to be the case by describing an actual scene that came under his notice, where an old gentleman and his wife were riding along comfortably with two children. The old man and the boy in front, and the old lady with a boy in her lap behind. This system of riding is very popular among young ladies and gentlemen in Virginia. The young Virginian mounts his horse, dashes up to the saddle-block, catches his sweetheart by the hand and she bounds like an agile gazel to the blanket behind him, and then she adds interest to the occasion by winching her arms around him, and his good horse starts off at a jolly pace.

Now, this young swell got along very well in his visit, until one day he was at church at one of the country churches, and a young lady who owned a very comfortable place near there invited him to go home and take dinner with her. There were three or four very interesting young ladies stopping at her house, and, of course, he accepted her invitation with great pleasure; but his hair fairly stood on end when she said to him: "I guess you will have to take one of the girls on your horse; in dividing up our party one at least comes to you."

The young man in question is not a heavy weight physically. He does not weigh over ninety pounds. The young woman who fell to his lot was a bouncing Virginia lass, plump and pretty, who would weigh at least one hundred and forty pounds. He was in no haste to get into the saddle. He watched very carefully how the rest of the fellows got their fair companions upon the upper deck. He was the last man to swing his horse in line. He had a little doubt, too, about his horse. The horse was very high-spirited and had never been ridden double.

He darted up to the horse block and the young woman was ready. The blanket was arranged behind after the most approved fashion. He edged his chestnut up to the side of the horse-block. She gave him one hand, and in a second she bounded firmly to her place behind him and wound her arms around him, in as firm a hold as the proprietaries of the occasion demanded. She was not the only one that had bounded.

The horse bolted about ten feet in the air and came down on his fore feet, and, as the young fellow said, suddenly became very light behind. The young man, although a very good rider, said he would have gone over the horse's ears several times if it had not been for the young lady. She held on, and he felt perfectly convinced that if he went off he wouldn't, and so she stuck. His horse fought, shied, jumped and balked, greatly to the amusement of the young lady, who very near cracked several of his ribs in holding on to him when his horse bolted to the right and left. It was five miles to his destination. When he got off his horse finally, and worked into the farm-house, three great streams of perspiration slowly trickled down the sides of his face. He was weak and trembling.

The lady of the house asked him how he liked his trip.

He said that under less exciting circumstances he might have relished the hugging part of it, but beyond that he was very willing to confess that it was one of the greatest tests that he had ever undergone in his life.

Died of Love.

(St. Louis Times.)

The Sunday supplement of the Times contained a strange story, clipped from the Joplin Daily Herald, relating how Prof. Houser, a phenologist, had been followed by a married woman, whose home is in North Missouri.

She deserted her home and followed him to Indianapolis, to Lancaster, Ohio, and then to New York City. During all this time the Professor, though well aware of the woman's infatuation, never spoke to her. She wrote him a number of love letters, but he never answered but one, and in that advised her to return home, and reminded her that he was a married man. Once she sent him a diamond ring, but he returned it.

While the Professor was in the midst of his lecture at Joplin the woman found her way behind the wings of the stage and handed a card to the reporter of the Herald, with the request that he would give it to the Professor at once. The card bore the single inscription in a delicate hand, "Will you speak to me to-night? My last request," and was signed "Fanny." The reporter stepped to the edge of the stage, and beckoning the Professor to him, handed him the card. One glance at the handwriting and the Professor's face grew deadly pale.

With a quick step he reached the reporter's side and in an agitated voice said: "Please take her away." The woman threw back her veil, disclosing a pale but beautiful face, but the Professor stepped quickly back on the stage and resumed his lecture. The reporter then tendered the woman his services as an escort, which she accepted, and he escorted her to a house which she said was occupied by her cousin. On the way there she told the reporter where she met the Professor, and admitted that she fell madly in love with him; that she forgot home, husband, friends and that she was a wife. The Professor refused to encourage her infatuation, and this only tended to make her love the more. She stated that her husband became aware of her strange passion, and brought suit for divorce, for which she did not blame him. The reporter bade the strange woman good night at the relative's door, and then returned to the doctor to have her every statement corroborated.

The above is a synopsis of the story clipped from the Joplin paper. Note the sequel: At 12 o'clock that night the unfortunate died from opiate-poison administered by her own hands. Her condition was not discovered by her relatives until too late to save her. The remains were sent to her husband's home.

Editing Out West.

(From the New York Tribune.)

The unhappiest man in the Far West is always the editor of the pioneer newspaper. Witness this touching appeal from the Bentonian (Cal.): "We have collected $55 50 cash during the past six months, and lived on that sum. In addition to this week's work at the case we have looked after the chores of the office, made up the paper, cut and wet down the paper, washed the rollers, worked the press, put up the mails and carried the paper. We have bought, begged or stolen the firewood, and chopped it with a borrowed axe.

"We have done our own cooking and lived on one meal and a cold lunch a day, never getting a good square one except when a chance half dollar fell in our way, and we would rush up to the California Hotel. We have lived on boiled beef with an occasional turnip, and not unfrequently a boiled frozen potato and salt for dessert. We would then change our diet to soda crackers and sweetened water for a few days. There is nothing so conducive to health as frequent change of diet. For the last week or two we have been gormandizing on bacon and beans straight, with crackers steeped in weak tea. What tobacco we can not beg we buy on credit. We have not been in bed or laid on a mattress since last May."

A Wedding in the Woods.

(Statesville (N. C.) Landmark.)

In Alexander County (Miller's Township) one day last week, a marriage took place under rather singular circumstances. Mr. Pink Lackey and Miss Betty Miller were the high contracting parties, and T. A. Hudson, Esq., performed the ceremony. The bride, the groom, the magistrate and friends met at a certain point in the woods at a given hour, and on the side of the road, beneath the branches of the trees, the Squire pronounced the bans. It is alleged that these surroundings were not chosen for the nuptials without cause—the cause being, according to report, that the groom is a moonshiner, and was lying out from the raiders, one of whom was among the invited guests. Though no banquet halls were thrown open to the couple this sylvan wedding was not celebrated altogether in dryness. A quantity of Alexander County "black" had been providently brought to the spot, and some of the members of the bridal train partook of the fluid until they could probably not have told a moonshiner from a raider across the public road.

According to Chinese notions of rank, masters must not occupy sleeping rooms below their servants. Consequently the family of the Chinese Professor in Cambridge, Mass., sleep in the attic, and the servants down stairs.
