WHILE the young noddies of this country are feebly aping the social extremes and personal eccentricities of the English, the better class of Englishmen, or more conservative element of that country, is falling into the adoption of many things peculiarly American. Our political methods are not less influential than our foods in twisting the prejudices of John Bull, since he is compelled to acknowledge the superior flavor of both. But the most pleasing evidence of the worth of American characteristics for imitation is the change of English magazines to a closer conformity with the style of that sort of literature in this country. The English were for a long time incredulous of the Yankee ability in literary efforts of any kind, our pretensions being laughed over and our efforts belittled. It was the notion that an American novelist was a lettered monstrosity, to be held up for the curious gaze of the masses. To find all this so much altered that our style of magazine is regarded as a fit model to follow is not so much to our honor as it is to the credit of the English in waking up to a consciousness of the progress the writers of this country have made in shaping the course of literature. It must come in time that London will turn to America for the best productions of pen and pencil. This country moves rapidly and irresistibly in its chosen directions, and just now all classes of pure literature are receiving the attention of the best minds in the country, and the impression made will not only be good, but lasting. New books, essays, and plays will be to France and England very soon what similar productions there are now to this country. We are becoming more and more independent in these respects, and with settled independence there is always the spirit of aggression. America will take the supremacy in the field of letters, as she has in most others into which she has entered.—Inter Ocean.

Miles of spruce forest in Maine are dead. Lumbermen are not agreed as to the cause. About eight years ago the heavy autumn rain loosened the earth, and that was followed by terrible gales and a severe winter. The theory, however, generally accepted by the best judges, is that the trees died from old age. The decay is mainly in sections that have not been cut over. The age of the spruce is from sixty to ninety years.
