A new Indian Torture.

The Apaches have found a new and improved torture. It is a slow and sure death—terrible to the victim in its pangs of anguish; frightful in its nibbling bites; excruciating in its millions of stings and horrows in its slowness of death. What these demons of hell cannot think of almost "expresseth comprehension." Now when the country is favorable, the Indians take a prisoner, strip him naked and pin him down over a large ant hole, and leave him there in the boiling sun until myriads of ants actually torture him to death. His writhings and piteous appeals for mercy—mercy for them to kill him are laughed at. Still they show some mercy for they seal him and stop his escape in his face; they then skin him in strips, thus giving the ants a fresh start or additional vigor then after having suffered untold agonies, becomes, praise be to unaccustomed nature, and dies. Eastern sentimentalsists made a note.—Nogales Frontier.
