BROTHERLY KINDNESS.

I meet them oft upon Broadway, Two strong and stalwart men, Each in his walk betraying well The city's denizen;

Linked arm in arm they move along Like those of kindred mind, Bound by the tie of brotherhood; And one of them is blind.

And, glancing far and wide.
Whate'er he sees he quick imparts
To the brother at his side,
Who listens with an eager car, And questions as he goes.
While on his face the lovely light
Of cheerful patience glows.

The favored one the simple scenes Upon the way will mark,
And paint them vividly for him
To whom the world is dark,
And beggars not himself at all,
But doubles his delight.
By sharing thus his benefits
With one deprived of sight.

In wisdom both together grow; But he, with curtained gaze,

A calmer judgment, riper thought,

And firmer will betrays:

So each upon the other leans,

And kind assistance lends,

Their bends are gray, and they have walked This way for years and years,
Linked arm in arm; and strangers oft
Have gazed on them with tears;
And they have shown throughout their

A construction train had orders to occupy the main track on one of the roads centering in Pittaburgh to make repairs. In arranging meeting places for seven extra sections of a stock train coming East, I entirely forgot the construction train. From a point out the line I got word of an accommodation train, and sent word to give her a white block, which meant a clear right of way. A moment after I thought of the construction train. It was too late to do any thing. On speeded the passenger train to destruction. I sank in a chair with my eyes riveted to the instruments, and thought of the hundreds of people who in a few minutes would be dead or dying through my carelessness. Seconds seemed hours.
