A BLEIGHING SONG. BY S. P. BRADDECK.

Over the snow, over the snow, Away we go, away we go! The earth gleams white 'neath the stars to-night, And all is bright Above and below.

"Old Gabe, good-by! Old Gabe, good-by! From you we say, from you we say— As if we were, Our feet stood spring, And the welkin rings, With our joyous cry, Gay Mirth is here, gay Mirth is here, Our hearts to cheer, our hearts to cheer: While we are glad, There's one by our side, To cheer or to chide, Who's always dear, Who's always dear."

Over the snow, over the snow, Away we go, away we go! There's freedom rare Abroad in the air, Freedom, Freedom, Above and below.

"What a terrible thing it must be to die of hunger, Anne."

"Yes, miss."

"There are stories told of victims closed up in walls, with just a narrow space to stand in, left with a pitcher of water and morsel of bread, and when that was gone they must stand there quietly, and wait for death. No, they could not wait quietly; think of the fearful despair—the agony. Shriek after shriek must have stifled within those stones." And Adriana shuddered.

"Don't speak of such things now, miss," said Anne. "I doubt if you are as well as you think for."

"I wonder how long they were in dying. I suppose all their past life came before them, and they knew then what their judgment would be. I dreading the future—a present foreknowledge."

"The girl grew more and more bewildered, and was greatly relieved to hear Mrs. Cunningham's step outside. Mrs. Cunningham gently opened the door, and seeing Adriana was awake came in.

"You look a little feverish; lie down again," and she smoothed the pillows, and laid Adriana's head on them. "I will take care of Miss Linden, Anne."

"Oh, no, I need not trouble any one," said Adriana.

"Indeed you need," answered Mrs. Cunningham; "but you must not speak of trouble. We owe too much to you to think anything that will bring back your strength a trouble."

"I am quite strong."

"So you think, but you do not know how one deceives oneself in these cases. You are just rested after your long sleep; but in the morning you will feel differently. After so long a loss of rest it takes some time to recruit."

"Oh, Mrs. Cunningham; please do not stay with me. I cannot bear to see you troubling yourself about me."

"Hush! I will not hear that word. I can only remember how you watched by Charles. What would poor Charles have done if he had come home to find his beautiful boy dead?" Adriana turned away her face. Mrs. Cunningham went on: "Margaret, too, she would have come to thank you, but I would not let her come to-night."

Adriana gave a convulsive sob. Mrs. Cunningham stepped down and kissed the pale forehead. She was a stately old lady, and generally unobtrusive, but there were tender places in her heart, and Adriana's undying devotion to her grandchild had stirred up depths of gratitude, added to a sort of fascination that had been gradually drawing her towards Adriana.

"Richard quite undervalues Miss Linden," she cogitated, and a sort of antagonism rose in her mind, a wish to show him that he was mistaken in his estimate. So she sat down to the bedside to watch.

Adriana's face was turned away; Mrs. Cunningham thought she was asleep.

Presently, in a slow measured voice, as of one speaking with an effort, Adriana spoke.

"Do not be offended, Mrs. Cunningham; but I think I should be better alone."

"As you wish it, then," said Mrs. Cunningham kindly; "good night and pleasant dreams."

"Pleasant dreams!" muttered Adriana, as the door closed. She sprang up, bolted it, and flinging herself on the bed again, burst into a wild fit of stifled laughter—stifled, for she dared utter no sound, else shriek upon shriek would have burst forth to have given her relief; as it was, she controlled any outcry, but her frame shook with convulsive sobs which she could not quiet. Again and again the prostrated burst forth, till she sank back exhausted, and sobbed herself to sleep.

Night drew her dark curtains closer around the weary frame, and Morpheus gently stole to the sleeper's side, and whispered into her ear pleasant words of the calm days of olden times ere sorrow had cast its shadow over her. The troubled soul fled to the quiet past. A little child sat holding its mother's hand under the deep spreading shade of a Spanish chestnut. Beautiful flowers were growing on every side, and the child looked its mother's hand to gaze upon. Ah! there was an unlooked-for sting in the flower, and the little one, with piteous cry, held out its hand. "Oh, mother, mother!" And the mother lifted up the child on her knee and kissed away the pain, and the child nestled closer and closer, comforted and protected.

Strange that such childish remembrances should come back; what train of waking thought had suggested them? Why should the thoughts fly back almost to forgotten infancy, when the bitter realities of the present were crowding their way into her heart? Who can tell the mystic economy of dream-life, the capricious wanderings of the soul, the immaterial, whilst the unconscious material, the body takes its rest—is dead to all around it? No outward impression conveyed through the medium of the senses; and yet the soul passes through scenes, wails mournful, terrible, joyful beyond all that occurs in our waking hours. Time is annihilated, circumstances disregarded, and incongruity does not seem incongruous.

Adriana's dreams were pleasant, and Mrs. Cunningham's wish was fulfilled.

CHAPTER X. Mr. Braddeek was pacing up and down the library; every now and then he paused.

"Richard," Mr. Braddeek was standing before the fire, apparently absorbed in the newspaper.

"Richard?"

Mr. Braddeek resumed his walk, and Mr. Braddeek remained poring over the paper.

"Why can't you answer a fellow when he wishes to talk to you?" said Mr. Braddeek, coming to a sudden halt.

"You've said 'Richard' at least four times, and I've said 'Well,' what more could I do?"

"It's a wretched question, giving questions," said Mr. Braddeek, asking the fire a poke and letting the poker drop.

"Dick, I'm not accustomed to making confidences, as you know, but I want you to answer some questions,
