(CONSOLIDATED FROM LAST WEEK.)

There was no need now to delay the marriage. It was nearly a year since Mr. Trevelyan died, and it would be better for Magdalen to have a protector. So the world said, and so all her best friends advised. The matter was discussed between Horace and Paul—Horace with his back to the light, and both his elbows on the table, his forehead against his hands. And it was agreed between them that Magdalen consented, it should take place, and here, while Horace was with them; and that he should draw up the settlements.

"Very well," said Horace, ostentatiously yawning, "that will do very well indeed." Call Miss Trevelyan, my dear boy.

Magdalen was sent for and in a short time came, looking pale as day than usual. For she had been fretting in the night, and had slept ill. She knew what she was sent for to do and to say—something in her heart told her that the message came to her. And indeed, she had been wondering why Paul had kept so long quiet. He did not know how grateful she had been to him.

"It is about our marriage, dearest," said Paul, as she entered. He placed a chair for her by the table, close to himself, and facing Horace and the window.

Magdalen stood for a moment as if irresolute, then, flushing up to her very temples, she drew her chair further away from Paul and sat down.

"Oh!" she said, as if involuntarily, "I had forgotten that!"

A faint smile stole over Horace's lips. He spoke so naturally, that he could not help smiling, though, indeed, no was in no humor for pleasure at this moment. Paul took it gently enough; only raising his eyes with his usual expression of injured humility, that made Magdalen almost frantic. If he had got up and beaten her, she would have respected him more; if he had spoken to her harshly, coldly, even rudely, so long as it was with manliness, she would have liked him better, than when he gave her the impression of lying at her feet to be trampled upon. When Horace turned to her, and said in a low voice, "Is that a speech you think it right to make to the husband of your own free choice, Miss Trevelyan?" and looked grave and displeased, Magdalen felt only respect and humility; if Paul were only like that!

"I am sorry I said it," she answered and then she spoke to Paul, and meant to be kind; but was only harsh instead.

"Horace thinks," began Paul timidly, "that you had better be married soon, Magdalen."

"Horace!" said Magdalen, with a laugh that was meant to express gaiety; but which was the very heart-ache of bitterness. "And you, Paul? It seems to me more a question with you than Horace!"

"I? Can you ask for more assurance of my earnest desire to be all to you, than brother, friend, husband, guardian, can be? Can you doubt if the exquisite delight with which I shall call you my own, and feel that our glorious lives have really begun together? You must not mistake me, Magdalen. If I spoke of Horace it was only as the supporter of my own wish—not as his originator."

Magdalen had shaded her face while Paul spoke. When she looked up, to meet the dark eyes opposite, fixed full upon her, she was paler than ever. She started and half rose, as if she were waiting for him to speak. But he turned away.

"I leave the matter to you both," she then said impatiently, "if do not wish to have anything to do with it. Arrange it between you as you like. I do not care for settlements, Paul. You are both men of honor, and will do all that is right."

She rose to go. She was almost sobbing now; not tearfully; but as men sob.

"Generous, noble Magdalen!" Paul exclaimed. "Perhaps you are right, in wisely feeling, as well as justified in your trustfulness; perhaps it is better that there be no legal claims on either side, but that our fortunes, as our lives, be mingled irrevocably."

"We will talk about that," I think Mr. Slade ought to be consulted," said Horace, a little drolly.

"You know what I mean, Horace?" said Paul, too happy at this moment to be wounded by a speech that in general would have stung his sensibility to the quick.
