A VISIT TO BULWER.

Dumas' Visit to Bulwer—A Magical Word Inspires the Young Frenchman—Described After His Own Penman's Style.

M. Alexander Dumas describes in the last number of the Revue de Paris, a visit, which he paid to Lord Lytton in 1868. He says: "When Dickens died, my heart was sad; for I knew him well, and so did my illustrious father, because he knew us and liked us; but when the great Bulwer died, I felt still sadder; for Bulwer, only a few years ago raised me from despair to hopefulness. Those who are able to do such things are better than apostles; they are angels. Misunderstand me not. Bulwer did not encourage me in anything mean. He only took me up, a broken reed, after fifteen years of literary life, when I was heart-broken, and said:

"Courage!"

How did I become acquainted with Bulwer? Go back thirty years. What was I but a boy? What was my father? A great man. This great man lived at Versailles. He had a court. Who were his courtiers? Balzac and Eugene Sue. I, poor little fellow, was almost stupefied in peering around my father—the incarnation of goodness—so much ability and brilliancy. Do you know why I never appreciated him? Because I heard too many of them. One day there appeared in my father's table a slender gentleman of foreign aspect. My father took me upon his lap, and said to his strange guest: "This is my son!" The distinguished stranger, with a wonderful air of kindness in his fine eyes, took me in his arms, kissed me, and said:

"Dear child,

"I was anxious to know who he was. I asked papa, and he said:

"He wrote Eugene Aram."

"He wrote Eugene Aram!"

It was Bulwer. They made me learn the English language. I never regretted it. That was long ago. We were all happy. We grew up, and I grew old, and father remained young. France was quiet. I wrote, and sometimes people applauded me. One day they hissed one of my plays. I was there; but when I heard his hissing, I did not betray any emotion. I thought my play was good; yet, when I went home, and retired to my couch, I buried my head in my pillow. Ah! France had become too small for me—I wanted to flee, and I went to England. Whom should I meet in England but M. Louis Blanc?

He said to me:

"You must see Bulwer."

Everybody in London knew where the great man lived. Next day I knocked at the door of his elegant house. He sat at once that he would see me. I entered his library. There he was, the same noble features of his who had taken me in his arms at Vincennes, at my father's house, only his hair had grown more silvery. He was affected when he saw me, and he said:

"I was hardly able to restrain my tears. Once I heard M. Thiers complimenting a parliamentary orator. That made a deep impression upon me. But what was my sensation when the great Bulwer said to me he had read my plays, and he had been deeply interested in them?"

Our conversation was very long; but to me it seemed very brief. Bulwer said that he would rather be a great dramatist than a novelist. With that naive which is sometimes peculiar to great authors, he asked me which of his works I liked best. I was embarrassed, and I said:

"Pelham!"

"Everybody likes that," he said slowly; "but have you read Rienzi?"

"Head and admired it," was my answer.

"Was it really good?"

"In my opinion, faultless."

There was a smile of gratification in his beautiful eyes. Mine grew lustrous as I saw it.

He asked me how long I would remain in England.

I told him what had brought me there. He laughed at me.

"What! so small a misfortune as that!"

I dropped my eyes. Bulwer laughed, and said:

"You Frenchmen are the most clever, but also the most sensitive of play-wrights. I know something of your first audiences in Paris. I have been among them. But nothing does them more good than to tear down what ought to be applauded. I assure you I myself would never venture with a play first before a Parisian audience."

"Ah," I said, "your Lady of Lyons is popular all over France."

"Yes," he answered, "because I am an Englishman."

When we parted he whispered into my ear:

"Courage!"

That noble word sustained me ever afterward, and I recalled it when I received the news of the death of the great and good man.

A coroner's jury in Kentucky found a man guilty of murder and sentenced him to jail for life. The condemned man now proposes to have a trial.
