Enjoyable Garden Party.

One of the prettiest entertainments given recently, was the garden party given on Saturday, September 1st, by Mrs. Sol Brill, in honor of her little daughter Selma, who had just reached her sixth birthday. One of the pleasant features of the afternoon was the cutting for the souvenir ring in the cake, ornamented by six wax candles, which resulted in the coveted slice being secured by Miss Alice Brill.

The donkey party that ended this happy affair, was greatly enjoyed by all who were present.

Master Alvin Goldstein won the first prize and Miss Miriam Winston the second.

Mrs. Brill was assisted in entertaining by Mrs. N. Goldstein and Misses Floritte Goldstein, Pauline Elkas, Beulah Frankel and Gertrude Frankel.

The little guests present were: Misses Stella Strauss, Camille Hirsch, Alice Bull, May Torian, Mary Belle Crittenden, Elias Blum, Marcella Marshall, Gertrude and Lister Isenberg, Sylvia Holzman, Amy and Miriam Winston, Ethel Wetherbee, Vera and Fannie May Leysner, and Masters Sam Bull, David Strauss, George Crittenden, Alvin Goldstein, Fletcher Cohn, Milton Waldauer, Albert Blum, Leroy Lemly, Isadore Moyses, Willie Elkas, Jerome Hafter, and their waiters were: Sol Brill, Bernice Brill, David Strauss, David Goldstein and Jake Strauss.

Children's Beautiful Party.

PRETTY GOWNS FOR GROWING GIRLS.

For the First Time in Her History the French Maiden is Wearing Fashionable Dresses.

STYLES FOR NEW BODICES.

Skirts Will Be Much Trimmed, But There is Word That Tunic Will Soon Disappear.

SOME FASHIONABLE TRIMMINGS.

Trouville, France.—The dainty French girl is emerging from the severely prosaic condition in which her mother has always kept her into one that is more agreeable for the girl and certainly more attractive to the outside world.

It is a wonder that the French girl has ever married. Kept in the nursery and the schoolroom, denied the pleasures of the world, seldom or never visiting the theatre or opera, going nowhere and seeing no one, she has grown up a big-eyed innocent creature, as unlike the American girl as it is possible to picture her.

After her marriage, which was always arranged by her parents, the shrinking French girl emerges into the society woman, no longer timid, nor retiring, but with her whole life, bent, apparently, in making up for the time she lost in her girlhood.

The Misses Van Alen, daughters of J. J. Van Alen, the wealthy American who was appointed to the Court of Italy by President Cleveland, but who resigned from diplomatic reasons, were educated in France, after their mother's death, which occurred when they were tiny children. To their horror they were allowed no pleasures beyond a few most simple ones, such as were given to a child of four; and when they sought to gain the intellectual freedom of grown women they were restrained. So, with Miss Pauline Astor, but, in both cases, the fathers of the girls res-

THE PRINCESS WAS A DAUGHTER

Word comes from over the water that a little princess has come to the house of the Cantacuzenes. Miss Julia Dent Grant married Prince Michael Cantacuzene last September, the wedding taking place at Newport at the home of the bride's aunt, Mrs. Potter Palmer. The Princess went at once to her husband's estate, near Moscow, where she has since resided.

used them and gave them such freedom as is allowed in America.

BUD TO FLOWER.

The French girl is being seen now, as never in her life before. At Trouville the other day the writer counted half a dozen young women of eighteen and a dozen young women of one of the hotels. They were well dressed in all the pretty little belongings that seem a part of girlhood. By their side trooped a pink flannel young man bent upon pleasing them. They were French summer girls—types that were strangers to France before this year.

A French girl who formerly wore "any old thing" is now very modestly attired in fine little gowns that are designed for her and built specially to fit her figure.

In response to the demand for gowns for growing girls one of the tradesmen upon the Rue de la Paix advertises upon his sign half grown girls, and very becoming they are, with their broad waisted effects and their skirts that are made to escape the ground.

So very pretty are some of these gowns that you see young women who have been out several seasons copying them and dressing like the girl of sixteen, even to the wearing of the hair in a big loose coil at the very nape of the neck, where a big ribbon bow secures it.

While the figure of the growing girl should not be confined in corsets, it is true that, if the woman is going to wear the corset, she had better get used to it, as a girl. The girl's corset is now made, is straight in front and is worn merely as a support for the skirts, and it must be confessed that it is more comfortable to wear such a garment than to go without it, as he skirt bands do not cut so cruelly nor do the garments sag in all directions. Until the Empire styles are revived to stay vivified, and corsets are abolished, there is nothing that will meet the demands of comfort like the corset with the straight front.

Upon these lines are all the gowns for girls now built.

A model sketched at Trouville was in blue albatross, with the skirt laid in box plaits all the way around, except right in the middle of the front where it was plain. The waist was made with a shirred front and plain back. Such delightful sleeves were made with the bell shape elbow flaring well; and inside this bell there were worn Bishop sleeves gathered around the hands in a little tight cuff tied with ribbons.

...had a circle of corn colored satin ribbon fully five inches deep, brought around the waist very smoothly and hooked at the side, under the arm. Beautiful little pins of yellow topaz were used to secure the belt, fastening at the side and were placed at intervals around the girdle.

BLUE AND YELLOW.

The stock was of the same smooth piece of yellow satin and a yellow satin ribbon tied the hair. Upon the front of the waist was a big handsome bow of the yellow satin, thus finishing the waist very prettily.

Of course the tiny bolero must always be in evidence and a small bolero of Irish point was slipped on over this waist. As though there could be any warmth in a tiny little garment like this, the bolero was lined with satin to be taken off when the sun shone brightly.

The bell-shaped sleeve will be the sleeve of fall for young and old. While many sleeves are falsely called the bell the true bell-shaped sleeve is the one that is very tight to the wrist, but below the wrist it flares into a bell. The bell sleeve is worn very long and also very short; the latter being only to the elbow, where it has a big bell just above the point where the arm bends. Below the bell there is the Bishop sleeve in lace extending to the wrist.

There are many styles worn by the young and those of more mature mould. One of these is the sleeve just described. Another is the draped tunic which is composed of rather long walking upon the bust line. At the waist there is a broad belt or girdle, and below the belt, the tunic falls in gathers again, to a point nearly to the foot of the skirt. Underneath there is a skirt trimmed with a very deep flounce.

A very charming and is sometimes used for finishing the tunic and also for finishing the trimming of the skirt. It consists of a piece of goods so cut that, when folded and fastened, it will fall in little plaits, as a side trimming.

Early autumn street gowns will be made in very light shades of cloth, the prettiest and most delicate of these being the color which is nearly white, with shades of pink and blue showing through it. The weaving of such a piece of cloth is a work of art as the threads are woven through the goods in such a way as to show blue from one direction and pink from the other. The color will be among the most fashionable of the fall shades.

BRILLIANT LININGS.

There is a vogue for brilliant linings. A gown, recently made for an American woman to wear at Newport this September, is of ice cloth cool, shimmering and beautiful. The skirt, which is very short, being little more than ankle length is lined with Jack rose taffeta. The coat is an Eton with white silk revers, the whole of ice cloth lined with the Jack rose taffeta. Revers of the silk turn over at the throat. The blouse to be worn with the Eton is a pale blue gingham the plaids showing a thread of red.

A brilliant little soft felt hat will be worn with this suit. The color of the hat is Jack rose, exactly to match the lining of the skirt. A broad Jack silk tie will be knotted at the throat.

The bolero is becoming more and more eccentric. One of the newest boleros is extremely short in the back
