Pleasant Reading for the Hospitable Reader.

Adelphi, O., Thursday, May 10, 1888.

Leaving the primitive cabin and its aged occupant,—the last tie connecting the past with the present history of this Ash Cave country—we continued on down Queer Creek Canyon to within a short distance of Bloomingville, the oil city of Ohio. After circling around on several nameless ridges in the vain attempt to locate some delinquent subscribers, we shaped our course for Mr. A. C. Wright's (in the Liberty Hill district) reaching there just as the dinner bell was ringing out the appetizing message: "The midday meal is now ready." His spouse recognized us on sight from the life like etchings in the Sentinel, and gave us a welcome in keeping with her royal entertainment.

After dinner, Mr. Wright took us out to view a fine body of growing wheat, which certainly takes rank second to none seen along our route. For the past three years, the progressive citizens of Liberty Hill have supported a Literary Society, and once a week some one of the life topics of the day are handled in a very creditable manner by local orators and future statesmen. Surely other districts throughout the county would do well in joining Liberty Hill in a movement, having for its object the raising of the standard of intelligence among the masses, and consequently elevating them to a higher plane of usefulness.

The sun's rays were fast fading from the delectable hills, Saturday evening, as we made our advent down into the village of Bloomingville. Railroads and coal oil are the principal topics of conversation among her citizens, who believe the dawn of a new era is about to break in upon them, and turn the tide of prosperity down through these rugged hills. Nothing much in the way of drilling for oil is being done here at present. One or two of the wells are jealously guarded by their owners, leading to this region the air of the great Pennsylvania oil district.

The extension of the Adelphi and Kingston railroad through this section is only a question of time. The benefits likely to accrue from the proposed enterprise may possibly be the subject of a future letter.

From Bloomingville we made a bee line for John Buchanan's residence, down on Salt Creek, where we banked our all in on stopping over Sunday to recuperate our wasted energies and ruminate over the uncertainties attending the average newspaper solicitor on his annual pilgrimage to the patrons of his Journal. But we were doomed to disappointment. Owing to the lack of household help, the gentleman said it would be impossible to accommodate us, but kindly directed our gaze to a farm house some distance back among the ridges, where he thought, we could likely stay over Sabbath.

Thither we turned with weary hearts and stomachs that were fast getting in shape to breed a famine. After a toilsome climb over intervening ridges, we arrived at our anticipated "haven of rest," only to meet with another cruel disappointment. The gentleman was very sorry indeed, but circumstances were such he didn't see how he could possibly keep us. Before another excuse could be framed, the junior wing of the staff was in the midst of a stereotyped tale of how, in a temporary fit of journalistic enthusiasm, we had started out from the home office counting on drawing a sufficient amount at the Queer Creek bank to defray the rest of the expenses round the circuit, but on reaching there we found the doors closed, owing to a sudden decline in Ash Cave hotel stock. As a result we were financially wrecked, and unless taken in out of the cold by some charitably inclined person, we would be driven to the dire necessity of raising milk houses by right and sleeping in barn lofts by day.

Looking askant at us he inquired: "Ain't you two newspaper fellows?"

We replied in the affirmative. "I thought as much," he retorted, letting his hand drift to his pistol pocket, "this is the fourth time that same old mossy story has been sprung on me. The first to work it around here was a fellow by the name of Larson somebody. I fail to recall his name just now, but he looks a heap like Pete Eby. Well, as I was saying, he was the first to work the tale, and I took him in more out of pity than anything else. And what do you think; the first night while roaming around in the kitchen in half dress, searching for some butter-milk, his feet flew from under him, letting his body fall with a dull, sickening kerplunk into the smoky depths of a large kettle of quince butter, valued at not less than ten dollars. Now add to this the cost of his board and a new calico shirt, not counting in the pleasure our palates were forced to forgo, and you have the loss sustained by him.

The next to work into my good graces was a fellow calling himself See I. Bee. He was a hand some sort of a chap with as lovely a pair of eyes as I most ever gazed into. He had a coffee sack plump full of cats, heterogeneous in point of age and color, but decidedly homogeneous in disposition. He coaxed me into letting him leave them in the kitchen, and I, like a darn fool, consented, knowing at the time there were no less than twenty crows of cream ranged around its walls, waiting for the morrow, to be taken up by the creamery wagon. Some time in the night the mouth of that sack worked loose. The next day the creamery wagon rolled away from my door with empty tanks, leaving me to solve the problem, "if a cent and a half can drink an pint and a half of cream in an hour and a half, how long will it take a hundred averaged sized cats to get away with twenty gallons of cream?"

The third and last to drop in on me like a mid-summer nightmare, was a sandy haired, sandy complexioned individual, who introduced himself as the J. Wolff. The next morning, the feathers from fifteen ducks, one gander and a turkey gobbler, marked the trail of the auburn warrior. That was the last straw that sent the camel to grass. I took a solemn oath he'd be the last I'd ever harbor. You are two likely looking youngsters, and I feel for you after a manner; but my advice is move on, and move quickly, too, before the memory of past wrongs swoops down and transforms me into a demon."

We stood not on the order of our going, but digging the spurs into our horses' flanks, flew down the grassy slopes at neck break speed, until reaching Bloomingville, where, while waiting for supper at the Ohio House, we discussed the feasibility of pushing on to Haynes Post Office that night, or invest in a box of vaseline and lay up at that point until the arrival of an ambulance from the city. We chose the former course, and after appeasing our hunger, again mounted our steeds and started up Salt Creek, arriving at Uncle Dan Davis' between nine and ten o'clock at night. Fortunately for us, he had been routed out of bed by some country boys, who wished something out of the store, thereby saving us the trouble of expanding our lungs.

In his kind fatherly way he made us welcome, and soon we were ensconced in a soft downy bed, oblivious to all things mundane.

The next morning, (Sunday) we were up by times and received a very cordial reception from the rest of the family. During the course of the forenoon, the Misses Edta and Ella Mettler, of Salt Creek's most charming and accomplished young ladies, entertained us with some delightful music and songs, for which we can hardly thank them enough, coming as it did at a time when our poor nerves needed just such a soothing sedative as only sweet, delicious music can bring.

The middle of the afternoon we resumed our journey up the Salt Creek Valley until reaching Rufus Karshner's, where we dismounted a little while to rest our beausts and enjoy the cool shade of his lawn. Mr. Karshner is one of the five men of Salt Creek, and keeps abreast with the times in all things pertaining to politics.

From here, we went to Daniel Hostler's, where we stayed all night. To Mr. Hostler and his affable lady, we desire to return our heartfelt thanks for the kindness shown us while guests in their home.

The next point visited was Laurelville, the principal town in the Southwestern part of the county. Among the various industries carried on here, we noticed a large grist mill, a spoke factory and a planing mill. Her citizens are wide awake, energetic people, who comprehend the full meaning of the saying, "God helps those that help themselves."

We called on several patrons and friends of the Sentinel, but not finding them at home, concluded to scale the neighboring height, on whose summit is located the classic little city of Adelphi, and pay our respects to the talented young editor of the Border News, Mr. Hugh F. Eagan.

The sanctum was deserted on our arrival, but his genial aide-de-camp, Walter Almerman and Ray Markell, done the honors of the occasion, extending to us the freedom of the office. Later in the day we had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Eagan, who is nothing if not a royal whole-souled gentleman. From a little oblique sheet, he has succeeded in raising the Border News to the proud position it now occupies among its cotemporaries in Central and Southern Ohio.

A fine press has recently been placed in the News office, giving to it a somewhat metropolitan air. The first thing that attracts one's attention on coming into Adelphi from the plains below, is the terminus of the Adelphi and Kingston railroad, which runs through the celebrated Kinnikinnick country. This short line has a peculiar history. Some few years ago, a company undertook to construct a railroad leading from the Scioto Valley road at Kingston, to the coal fields of the Hocking Valley, but running short of funds, while building the first ten miles, they borrowed several thousand dollars of John Karshner, at that time one of the wealthiest land owners in the Kinnikinnick country. Seeing that unless something was done he would lose his money, Mr. Karshner, who has justly earned the sobriquet of "Plucky John," took the matter in sole charge, and with the aid of subscriptions and money obtained by mortgaging his broad acres, he completed the first ten miles of the road, stocked it himself and has been operating it for the last two or three years.

Armed with a letter of introduction from Mr. Eagan, we presented ourselves to Mr. Karshner, who kindly invited us to take a ride over the road, an offer we gladly accepted. The passenger train consists of one combination passenger coach, the seats being ranged along the walls like street cars. With the exceptions of secretary, fireman and engineer, Mr. Karshner occupies all the other multifarious positions necessary to keep the system going. By a recent court decision Mr. Karshner is now sole owner of what is, in all probabilities, the shortest line in operation in the United States.

To the Border News, from the editor down to the devil, we wish to return our thanks for the very substantial courtesies shown us while in their midst. Come over, boys, and we will illuminate and paint the city a bright vermilion.

Next week we will conclude our trip by giving you readers a true account of Ben White's historic turtle and our wild ride through the Black Jack country.

FRANK ADAMS.
