A few years ago one of the chief sources of enjoyment connected with our Fourth of July celebrations was the intense mortification it was supposed to inflict upon the British Lion. But that's all over now. This year we celebrated the Queen's birthday, and the English are arranging to help us celebrate the Fourth. Time brings wonderful changes. Not so long ago we wouldn't have believed it possible, for instance, that we could ever sell such thoroughly good and reliable shoes at our present extremely low prices. You'll be surprised, too, if you'll drop in. Atlas & Duga, Logan, O. MEMORIAL. Mrs. Ann Bringardner, wife of Martin Bringardner, died at her home near St. Josephs on June 11, 1898, in the eighty second year of her age. She was the eldest daughter of Joshua Green, born in Harboughs Valley, at the base of South Mountain, Maryland and with her parents came, the baby, to Ohio in 1818. She was married to Martin Bringardner, in June of 1839, in the old log church at St. Josephs which her father, one of a dozen pioneers, helped to build in that very early morning day. Her husband's farm adjoined her father's. Here in a place, sacred in all of the affections of birthplace and habitation, Ann Bringardner lived in womanly quiet for over the allotted span of "three score and ten," and raised her family in the sound of the Angelus Bell. Her husband, a man of eighty-eight years, and five children survive her. In these wild, rushing, material times, not much account is given by the world in the death and burial and disappearance of a good woman. Her name is not inscribed on monumental stones or stained glass windows. She was dutiful to her family, to her church, to her neighbors, and in loving hearts is cheerful tribute and memorial prayer. Aunt Ann was a woman who took no part in public affairs. She didn't belong to societies that wear uniforms and made anniversary parades. She went to church and said her prayers and then went home and got dinner for the family. It was a kind of matter of fact way of doing and it is not exhibited in paintings for church or college walls, and it is not sung in hymns nor recited in poetry. But this is just what the dutiful woman simply did. She did not ride in carriages on great occasions. She did not conduct the church fair nor picnic festival. She was not the head nor a part of the information bureau, nor a messenger of gossip through the community; a quiet, prudent, indulgent motherly woman who made her home her kingdom and her sanctuary where the good might learn from her if they listed, how to be better. Aunt Ann was a home-body. So often was she scolded because she didn't "go out." The word would go round, as it does in country neighborhoods that somebody is sick, somebody died. Aunt Ann would leave her unbaked bread in the oven, and in home clothes and her black sunbonnet, which was the sign and symbol of a Messiah to the sick, would glide away, to where her hand hard and calloused and strong with work, could cook a brow or soften a pillow. For sixty-two years, Aunt Ann and Uncle Mart lived and labored; loved out and fought out the battle of life. She has gone to her rest and her reward. The world has nothing to bestow to her. Her children, eminent, useful, good are the testimonials, and friends in a wide country round have for her, prayer. May it not be but right when the recollection of the departed comes to us in the rush as well as the hush of life's day and night, when communion is held with the saints to vouchsafe a prayer to one whose quiet life is fragrant with benefactions to the sick and dying, and whose hand held the Crucifix, when the angel of death took the spirit home. There is a pious belief, not a dogma but a consoling suggestion that the good who have gone before us, "Visit us in Dreams. Glide over our memory, like shadows over streams." Let us hope that the good woman who was so attentive to the weak and weary living with her, may still, in spirit, look down upon us, still in the Valley with regards not altogether estranged, as we climb to the cope of the mountain to greet the sun of the eternal morning.
