

AUNT ALINE'S TRYST

The Coming of the Man She So Anxiously Awaited.

By JOHN ROXBURY.

(Copyright, 1909, by Associated Literary Press.)

"Why, Aunt Aline! How pretty you look! What have you been doing to yourself? And where are you going?"

Little Mrs. Jordan had run into her aunt's cozy home on her way to the city.

"Is it so unusual for me to look nice, Dollie?"

Miss Sherwin turned from the glass before which she had been giving a final touch to the soft brown hair that waved around her white forehead and smiled quizzically at her niece.

"No," returned the little matron with cordial sincerity; "you always look lovely to Dan and Nell and me. But you never would buy yourself pretty clothes while we were with you, and as you were always doing something for us you seldom took time to look at yourself. That new golden silk is wonderfully becoming, and that mechiu at your throat, with the quaint brooch of coral and silver, is most artistic. And you have such a pretty pink color in your cheeks. One would think you were a young girl going out to meet your lover."

The color of which Dollie Jordan spoke deepened to rose. Miss Sherwin laughed an odd, embarrassed little laugh.

"You mustn't come flattering me," she said. "And I don't wish to hurry you, but you'll miss your train to town if you stay much longer."

"Mercy me! So I will!" And with a hasty glance at the clock and a hurried kiss she rustled away at a rapid rate.

Miss Sherwin turned again to the mirror when she was alone. Dollie was right. She did not look her twenty-nine years. Indeed, the face that smiled back at her was very sweet in its bright serenity. The lips that parted over gleaming white teeth were full and rosy. And the large gray eyes, looking forth from under dark brows and lashes, had a beaming brilliancy.

"Maurice won't see much change in me," she said as she put on her hat. She slipped on a wrap and took up her gloves. But suddenly she stood still, shaken by the cruel dread. Suppose he were not there! It was a long journey here from Australia. Accidents innumerable were occurring every week. What if he were the victim of one? What if he were ill and could not make the trip?

The one greatest dread of all she did not voice even to her inmost consciousness.

"How foolish you are, Aline Sherwin!" she said, with an impatient little toss of her head. "His last letter said he would meet you at the old trysting place on this day, the anniversary of our engagement there. Maurice would never break his word."

She walked at a brisk rate the many blocks which lay between her home and the park. The charming suburban pleasure ground was gorgeous in its autumnal robes of amber and crimson and living gold. There was a continual drifting of glowing leaves through the blue, hazy air. And everywhere children were making merry, running and laughing and playing games.

But when Alice Sherwin reached the great stone fountain where the leaping water no longer glittered her heart sank with sudden, sharp disappointment. There was no one there but a gray haired, spectacled man, who glanced up at her approach only to bend instantly again over the paper he was reading. She took out her watch and consulted it.

"My watch is fast! I am ten minutes too soon!" she said.

She walked up and down the gravelled path near the fountain. To sit still was impossible. She watched the different avenues up which he might come. It was ten years since they had parted. Five minutes gone! At 3 he would be there, he had written—seven minutes!

And he need never have gone away if it had not been for Mary's unexpected death she might have gone with him. But Aline had declared herself bound to take care of her sister's children.

Six months ago freedom had come to her. Dan was a man and prospering. Dollie was married, and Nell had gone to live with her. So Aline Sherwin wrote to her lover that she was waiting for him.

The clock in the tower clanged out the hour of 3.

She started, and her reticule fell to the ground. Three, and he was not here! Each clang of the bell had struck on her heart like a blow.

"You have dropped your bag!" The man on the bench picked it up and offered it to her. Lifting his hat, "I'm afraid you are disappointed," he said pleasantly. "You were expecting someone?"

She hardly glanced at him. But she was in the mood for confidence, and his voice was sympathetic.

"Yes," she said and sat down. "A friend who has been long abroad was to have met me here this day, this hour, and he has not come."

"I've been a great traveler myself," the man said. "Where did your friend live abroad?"

"In Australia." Her eyes were still seeking an advancing figure along the paths that led to this fountain.

"I've been there. But of course it's a mighty extensive country, and the cities are populous."

"I suppose so," she assented absently. Her heart was like lead within her. "It would be absurd to suppose you had known Maurice Farar there."

"Let me see," he repeated musingly. "Yes, I did know a man of that name. What did your friend look like?"

"He was straight and handsome," she returned dreamily. "He had brown, beautiful eyes, a classic, clean shaven face and curling black hair."

"Oh, that isn't the man I know at all," he said positively. "The Farar I know is rather stout and bearded and quite gray."

Miss Sherwin nodded indifferently.

She glanced again appealingly at the clock in the tower. Fifteen minutes past 3! He was not coming.

"There is no use waiting," she said, rising. All the joyousness seemed to have left her. "Maurice would be here—if he were alive!"

How dreary the golden day had grown, how cold! And what a moan there was in the wind, a desolate cry that found its echo in her heart.

The man on the bench sprang erect, a straight, robust figure. He thrust his smoked glasses in his pocket, swept off his hat and held out eager arms.

"Aline!" he cried. "Maurice is here!" For one wild, stunned, incredulous moment she stared at him. Then she took a faltering step forward. His arms closed around her as she sobbed out her gladness on his breast. Marked by exile and labor, premature gray, and yet the same—the old sweet smile, the old loving eyes!

"It was no deliberate deception, dear. It was only when I saw you approaching that I remembered the glasses I must wear in strong sunshine and slipped them on. I cannot read with them on," he laughed, "but I bent over the paper just the same. My dearest own girl, will you forgive me? You have kept your girlish beauty. The fever that made my hair gray makes me look older than I am."

Her color had come back in a rose red tide. She smiled up at him, standing stalwart and dignified before her, and she cried to him: "You are handsomer than ever, Maurice! But even if you were really bent and crippled—yes, and blind—you would be, as you've always been, the only man in the wide world for me!"

And now the leaves had a merry rustle and the wind a song of joy.

Love in the Kitchen.

Among the domestic servants of a German woman is a very pretty Irish girl, not long in this country.

Now, Bertha had not been at work more than a couple of months before she became engaged to a plumber's apprentice. She confided to her mistress, however, that she had no intention of marrying at an early date, but wished instead to save her money and incidentally afford the apprentice time to become a regularly registered plumber.

The mistress good naturedly assented to the girl's request that she be allowed to visit her in the kitchen. It was observed that on such occasions only the voice of Bertha could be heard coming from the kitchen.

"Your sweetheart doesn't seem to be much of a talker," said the lady of the house to Bertha.

"No, mum," said Bertha; "leastways not yit. Mum, but he'll do better as to me goes on. He's too bashful yit, mum, to do anything more than yit!"
