A Plea for an American Institution. The Men's Classes in three of the Sunday Schools of Westminster have requested the pastors of the churches to preach upon the subject of the Sabbath on Sunday, May 13. This appeal has come from these men not so much from the religious point of view as it does from their belief in the necessity of the observance of this Day to civic welfare. No one has any right in this land where religious liberty is a cardinal principle to command his fellowmen to observe certain religious practices on this day but good citizens do have the right and are duty bound to insist on the proper observance of this day if it has to do with the progress and maintenance of American Civilization. That the observance of the Sabbath Day is a fundamental principle in our national life no one can seriously question who reads the history of our beginning and development thoughtfully. The opinion of representative statesmen on this matter fully establishes this as the truth.

Daniel Webster said: "The longer I live the more highly do I esteem the proper observance of the Christian Sabbath and the more grateful do I feel toward those who impress the importance of the community." Benjamin Harrison, one of the most careful and keen thinkers America has ever produced, said on this question: "Experience and observation convince me that all who work with hand or brain require rest which a general observance of the Sabbath only can secure. Whether we regard man as an animal or mortal, we should unite in securing for him the rest that body and spirit both demand for the best and highest good. Those who do not find the Divine command in the Book cannot fail to find it in the man." Horace Greely wrote: "Under our civilization the liberty of rest for each is secured only by a law of rest for all." Said Henry George, that great-hearted friend of the people whose love for mankind we admire whether we can accept his economic views or not. "I believe that the institution of the Sabbath is one of the greatest benefits the human race ever had. I believe in the strict enforcement of the law that prevents service labor being carried on on the seventh day."

John Foster said: "The Sabbath is a remarkable appointment for the raising of the general moral existence." That distinguished citizen who so recently spoke in our city, Theodore Roosevelt has discussed this matter in these terms: "Experience shows that the day of rest is essential to mankind; that it is demanded by civilization, as well as by Christianity." The recognition of the Sabbath Day as an American institution which should be respected and protected has been made by Judges on the bench of the Supreme Court, and by that Court itself. Justice William Strong declared, as follows: "The first settlers of this country were a body of select men. They were profoundly impressed by the conviction that a weekly Sabbath was essential to the highest welfare of the communities which they established, and they therefore enacted laws to enforce a proper observance of that day. The Sabbath so observed, no one can doubt, contributed largely to the formation of that character which has stood us in so much stead in our own history, and which has been the admiration of the world." The unanimous decision of the Supreme Court, delivered by Justice Field in March, 1855, upholds the government in its right to legislate, not to promote religious observance, but to guard Sunday as a day of rest and to protect all persons from the physical and moral debasement that comes from uninterrupted labor. Such considerations should prompt every loyal citizen to a jealous regard for the Sabbath Day. It is to lead him to do all that he can to guard the interests of the day by the enforcement of sane legislation, and by his own personal example in the way he keeps the day. Most of all he ought not to let petty questions of equity, rigidity, or quibblings over Sabbath observance, prevent him from doing his duty as a true American in preserving the spirit if this institution.
