Love As a Disease.
That "love-sickness" is no mere poetical fancy, but a real malady, is the pronouncement of an editor-writer in The British Medical Journal (London). Everyone knows that the rejected lover may suffer loss of appetite, waste of tissue, and depression of spirits. Burton, in his "Anatomy of Melancholy" that poudrous tone of which many have heard, but which few read—treats at length of the peculiar variety of melancholy due to despised love, and recounts its symptoms by the dozens. "According to Plato, Empedocles, the philosopher, who was present at the cutting up of one that died for love, reported 'his heart was consumed, his liver smoky, his lungs dried up, insomuch that he verily believed his soul was either sodden or roasted through the vehemency of love's fire.' The English writer goes on to say:

"From an Italian medical journal of recent date we learn that Dr. F. Barrett, whom we are enabled to identify, and to whose work no reference is given, holds that love is an intoxication of the nervous centers. The circulatory system may be affected, especially if the patient is young and is suffering from a first attack. This recalls to us Galen's story of how his own daughter, a young girl who was thought by her anxious parents to be dying. Believing that nothing more than love-sickness was the matter, the astute physician had the suspected object brought into her presence, meanwhile, keeping his hand on her wrist. The sight of the pulsating man, and the steady pulse in Galen's mind as to the cause of her indisposition." Dr. Barrett, we are told, has made researches on the people in love, and has found marked leucocytosis. If the disease is not speedily cured, love may lead to neurasthenia, and even insanity. It is high time, he concludes, that we should think of devising a purely medical treatment for love. What form is this to take? The bacillus of love has not yet been discovered, and therefore no vaccine is available for the cure of the disease. Montaigne also thought that love should be treated by medicine. As translated, by John Florio, he says: "Philosophy thinketh she hath not it implied her means, having yielded the sovereignty rule of our mind, and the authority to restrain our appetites, unto reason. Amongst which, those who judge there is none more violent than those which love begetteth, have this for their opinion, that they hold both of body and soule, and man is wholly possessed with them; so that health is self depended on them, and physics is sometimes constrained to serve them." We are left in the dark by Dr. Barrett as to the exact line of purely medical treatment to be adopted for the cure of love, and we venture to think that it will laugh at physics as it proverbially does at locksmiths. It is probable that none of the many methods described in Ovid's Remedies—Amoris, has ever cured a lover, and that the cure of the chief difficulty, in the way of successful treatment lies in the fact that the patient, as a rule, does not wish to be cured."—Literary Digest.

TO UNVEIL OWN STATUE
Veteran Has Built Monument With Civil War Pension Savings.

Not every man can unveil his own monument, but Melville H. Freas, veteran of the Civil War, the first of the first residents of Germantown, will do that very thing in Ivy Hill Cemetery, Mount Airy, Philadelphia, on Memorial Day, June 1st.

On that day Freas, in his old uniform and carrying the musket he hugged during the war, will go with his relatives to the monument he has caused to be erected and will fire a salute over his future grave. After he has read aloud Lincoln's Gettysburg address he will unveil the statue of himself that tops his monument.

Freas' monument was built with money the old soldier saved from his pension. On a base flanked by two massive pieces of stone stands a life-size figure in granite of himself in his uniform.
