FAMOUS SHARK KILLED. Blamed For Death of Many People At Port Royal Harbor.

Old Tom, a shark that has lived in the waters of Port Royal harbor, Jamaica, for 20 years and is known to thousands of travelers and seagoing men, was put to death by the island authorities several weeks ago.

The famous fish was one of the sights of the West Indies. He was to be seen every day in the clear waters of Port Royal and was fed regularly by the men of the British warship fleet stationed there.

He preyed upon the other fish in the harbor and was equally quick in attacking human beings. His presence precluded the possibility of sea bathing by the sailors and desertions among the crew of the British war vessels were few, as none had the fortitude necessary to swim ashore when old Tom was in the vicinity.

The shark always could be found near the warships and the boatloads of tourists who daily went out to see him were never disappointed. If he chanced to stray away for a few minutes the loud beating of a tinpan would invariably bring him back.

During the 20 years that old Tom has been a familiar object a number of persons have lost their lives in the waters of Port Royal, due, it is believed, to his man-eating proclivities. He was never seen, however, to kill a person until a few weeks ago, when he attacked and killed a young man who had fallen overboard from a warship cutter.

The sailors tried hard to save the boy, and although their efforts were in vain, several well-directed blows crippled Old Tom so badly that his capture a few hours later was an easy matter.

When the boy's death was reported the authorities decided that Old Tom must go. He was barely able to swim when they found him near one of the warships and harpooned him. The carcass was taken ashore and after being mounted will be placed in a museum at Kingston.

The shark was nearly 20 feet long. Native fishermen said he had the most vicious teeth of any shark ever killed in the vicinity of Port Royal. Among the articles found in his stomach were three fathoms of chain, a gold watch, a marlin pin and a miscellaneous collection of nails, bolts and other small objects.
