WILD BLACKBERRIES FOR THE TROOPS.

Demand For Jam Offers Chance for Children to Practice Patriotism and Earn Money.

Wild blackberries picked by children will help the Army and Navy to get the eleven million pounds of blackberry jam they must have. In view of the shortage of cultivated blackberries the United States Department of Agriculture urges the women and girls and boys to gather all the wild blackberries they can find, to supply commercial canning establishments.

Blackberry jam is particularly desirable because it has medicinal qualities which counteract certain intestinal troubles, in addition to its welcome place in the diet as a sweet.

The wild fruit is not so pulpy and is likely to be more seedy than the cultivated varieties, but there is an abundance in many of the Northern States. The difficulty of getting help on a commercial scale has prevented the gathering of the wild blackberries, but if the children can be enlisted to do their patriotic part, it will give the packers a chance to supply what the military authorities need. It is also pointed out that at the prevailing prices they may get good money return for their time and labor.
