What French Women are Wearing. There is a cable report on the fashions in Paris in the September Woman's Home Companion. The writer of it says:

"When officers and soldiers first appeared on Paris streets, smart features in the uniforms appealed to feminine fancy and immediately there were launched street costumes modeled nearly exactly on war uniforms. Naturally, what at first seemed smart became cheapened, and the faded frown of Parisiennes, good taste, had a short run to an absolute finish. From the beginning, the Parisienne of war time refused all conspicuousness of gowning, and what thought she gave to the subject was concentrated on an endeavor to unite elegance to simplicity. The 'little dress' that has ruled so long in Paris came into being from the recognized need of busy women who, under the strenuous new conditions, demanded a dress that could be quickly put on and easily adjusted. Achieved immediately, it conquered the world and is still the prevailing fashion in Paris."

"The first model was a straight sack chemise, loosely belted and closed in front. The sleeves were cut in one and the neck was collarless. From this developed many variations that extended into afternoon and evening toilettes."
