Belt Power Requirements

TODAY tractor belt operation is considered just as important as the tractor's ability to pull plows. But all tractors do not meet fully the requirements essential to successful belt work.

First, the tractor should have a throttle governor so that the fuel consumption is regulated according to the variations in load and a uniform speed maintained at all times; saves one man's time (no one required to adjust fuel) and prevents racing of both tractor and driven machine when running empty.

Second, the pulley should be so placed that the tractor can be backed into the belt without loss of time. It is much quicker and easier to do this than to back the driven machine into the belt by muscular energy of either men or horses.

Third, the pulley should be so placed that it does not rub against any part of the tractor nor drag on the ground. It should not be necessary to dig holes in the ground for the front wheels so that the belt will clear them—a waste of time and energy.

Fourth, the pulley should have a friction clutch so that the driven machine can be stopped or started at will without stopping the tractor engine.

Fifth, the pulley should have a broad diameter and a wide face to insure against belt slippage so that the full power of the tractor engine is delivered to the driven machine.

Sixth, successful operation should also include real economy of operation—a throttle-governed, kerosene-burning engine.

The Titan 10-20 kerosene tractor meets all of the above requirements in every detail. That is why we sell it and recommend it for successful belt work. Come in and let us talk it over the next time you are in town.
