CHICKEN THIEF'S WARM RECEPTION

Owner of Poultry Shoots Hat From Intruder's Head With Shotgun

Special to The Telegraph
 Marietta, Pa., March 25.—For some time past the residents of Marietta have been annoyed by petty thieving, but Christian Peck has been the heaviest loser. He had about fifty nice chickens of all varieties about a month ago. For a few mornings on going to feed them there seemed to be several missing. Last week the flock was getting very low, and he at once suspected that thieves visited his hen roost at night. The number still decreased, and loading his gun on Friday night of last week decided to give the thief or thieves a warm reception. At first neighbors thought a weasel had been carrying them off, but no trace of blood or feathers could be found. During the recent snows no tracks could be traced, and evidently the nights following a snow the roost was not visited.

On Sunday night about 11 o'clock Mr. Peck heard a noise in his pen. Proucing his gun he opened the back door and went outside to look. When about one hundred feet from the coop he saw a man come out very hurriedly, and he blazed away. The thief wore a stiff hat, and this was completely riddled with shot on both sides. Mr. Peck is about 75 years of age and very active, and has not lost his military spirit. Mr. Peck is carrying the hat around, trying to find out to whom it belongs.

While everything was done to relieve him, symptoms of lockjaw developed from which he is at present a sufferer.
