BUILDERS AIMING TO MEET DEMAND

rent at fancy prices, but that the investor who would put up good plain houses with conveniences but without elaboration or decorative details, a house, in short, that might rent anywhere from $15 to $18 a month would reap a richer return on his investment than the man putting up the other class of dwellings.

Possibly the awakening of the local contractors and investors is due to the recent sessions of the housing convention here, for speakers at those meetings insistently pointed out that the demand and need of communities was for the lower-priced houses, and that conditions making for such demand were practically countrywide.

Whatever the impetus lack of the present movement, its early realization is confidently expected. While there will be a number of pretty homes of a more less pretentious construction, the building this summer, according to present gossip in realty and construction circles, will be largely confined to the erection of dwellings of a substantial but inexpensive kind.
